"The law is progressive and expansive, adapting itself to the new relations and interests which are constantly springing up in the progress of society. But this progress must be by analogy to what is already settled."

EXPLANATION

THE object in view in preparing Corpus Juris Secundum has been twofold: First, to provide a complete encyclopedic treatment of the whole body of the law, which means that it must be based upon all the reported cases; Second, to present each title of the law in form and content most suitable as a means of practical reference for the Bench and Bar.

Corpus Juris Secundum is therefor a complete restatement of the entire body of American Law. The clear-cut and exhaustive propositions comprising the text are supported by all the authorities from the earliest times to date. The supporting case citations, conspicuously set out in the notes, point to all decisions handed down since the publication of Corpus Juris. When the searcher may wish to consult earlier authorities, a specific reference to Corpus Juris makes available all cases back to 1658.

Each title is preceded by a complete section analysis, greatly simplified to facilitate research. Where the scope of any section is such as to require it, a more minute analysis is found thereunder in its appropriate place within the title (see Abatement and Revival, Section 112). The convenience of this method—an innovation in encyclopedic writing—must immediately commend itself.

A concise black-letter summary, indicative of its scope, precedes the full treatment or statement of the law under each section. These introductory summaries, concise and free from interlineation of authorities, have proven of great convenience and value in legal research.

An index is found in the back of each volume covering the titles contained therein, thus providing another convenient means of ready access to the text and notes.

Corpus Juris Secundum is kept to date by means of annual cumulative pocket parts for each volume. This feature of supplementation which has proved so successful in modern digests and statutes conveniently, and with certainty, keeps each title constantly to date through current cases and new precedents.

Corpus Juris Secundum represents the combined product of the highest editorial talent and manufacturing skill. Its many excellent editorial features are fittingly accompanied by corresponding innovations and improvements in mechanical arrangement, typography, and design, which the publisher believes will commend themselves to the profession as representing a new standard in legal publications.

§ 1. Definition

a. Estate
b. Interest
c. Tenant; tenancy

a. Estate

"Estate" is a term which in its ordinary usage may signify condition in life and may include property, rank, office, income, social position, or character. In legal usage it is of more restricted meaning, ordinarily as indicating the position in which a person stands with regard to the ownership, possession, and control of his property, or as meaning the property itself.

In a popular sense "estate" may signify condition in life, prosperity, or adversity, and may include not only property but also rank, office, income, social position, and even character.[1] In legal parlance its meaning is more restricted,[2] but is not always uniform.[3] In many cases its precise meaning can be ascertained only from the context, or the circumstances under which it is used;[4] but, unless there is a clear intention to convey a different meaning, it should be construed in its ordinary and accepted meaning,[5] and in a sense which will accomplish and not defeat the purpose of the instrument in which it is used.[6]

As originally used the term signifies the condition or circumstance in which the owner stands with regard to the ownership, possession, and control of his property;[7] but objectively it has been extended to indicate the property itself.[8] The terms "estate" and "property" are often used synonymously.[9]

As used in statutes, if not expressly defined,[10] the import of the term "estate" depends in a great degree on its association with other expressions,[11] and must be found from the context and purpose of the statute,[12] and the fixed absolute sense of the word in the abstract must give way to the connection in which it is used.[13] It may include personal, as well as real, property[14] of every kind.[15] It may, however, be limited either to personalty[16] or realty.[17] Generally, when legal enactments are intended to apply exclusively to one or the other of these different species of property, the statutes use the proper qualifying words, "personal" or "real" estate, as the case may require.[18]

An estate in land is the degree, quantity, nature, or extent of interest which a person has in it;[19] as applied to land it does not necessarily import a fee or even a freehold,[20] but merely the quantity of interest a person has from absolute ownership to naked possession,[21] and is applied to rights in land, both in possession and expectancy, and to future estates either vested or contingent.[22] It has been held that it does not apply to the possession of lands without color of title,[23] and that neither a right of entry,[24] an exclusive right to acquire the title to certain lands,[25] nor the interest of a tenant under a lease to begin at a future date,[26] is an estate.

There is a very plain and marked distinction between an estate in lands and a title to lands, the former signifying the interest which a person has, and the latter the evidence of his right, or of the extent of his interest, or the means whereby he is enabled to assert or maintain his possession.[27] An estate in land is also distinguished from a lien on the land in that an estate is the right to possession and enjoyment of the land, whereas a lien on the land is the right to have it sold or otherwise applied in satisfaction of the debt.[28]

"Landed estate." In the ordinary meaning of the words, an interest in, and pertaining to, lands.[29] Landed estates are of three kinds: (1) Those which are not limited by precise bounds, but are described by quantity. (2) Those which have fixed artificial limits. (3) Those which have natural boundaries, such as rivers, mountains, or woods.[30]

"Settled estate." The meaning of the term, whether in legal or popular language, as contradistinguished from an estate in fee simple,[31] is understood to be one in which the powers of alienation, of devising, and of transmission according to ordinary rules of descent are restrained by the limitations of the settlement.[32]

An estate by purchase is one acquired by sale or gift, or by any other method except only that of descent.[33]

"Estate" and "equity" are not synonymous terms either in meaning or substance.[34]

"Estate" and "heirs" are not equivalent terms; the estate is the subject matter with which the grantor deals; the heirs are possible distributees.[35]

"Estate" and "succession" may be used as having the same meaning.[36]

Trade, business, or employment. It has been said that the word "estate" in its full sense may perhaps include trade or business,[37] and that the interest of a person in his continued employment, and his right to enjoy such employment free from malicious interference from an outsider, are included in the term "estate."[38]

b. Interest

"Interest," as applied to property, means the legal concern of a person in the property, or in the right to its benefits or uses. Its meaning, however, may be varied according to the context or connection in which it is used.

As applied to property, the chief use of the term "interest" seems to be to designate some right attached to property which either cannot, or need not, be defined with precision.[39] It means the legal concern of a person in the thing or property, or in the right to some of the benefits or uses from which the property is inseparable.[40]

The word "interest," when applied to property, has a variable meaning to be determined in any case by the context, intention, and circumstances.[41] It may be used as synonymous with "estate,"[42] or "title,"[43] or "property;"[44] or it may be distinguishable from "title,"[45] or "estate."[46] An interest in property may comprehend the entire title thereto,[47] as well as something less than the entire title.[48] It may be used to denote something less than an estate,[49] or ownership,[50] or title;[51] a merely beneficial property right.[52] When used in contradistinction to "title," it means any right in the nature of property, less than title;[53] it may not mean a greater estate than title.[54]

"Interest" may be used in a broader and more comprehensive sense than "title."[55] It may include both equitable and legal rights.[56] It may have even the same meaning as the phrase "right, title, and interest."[57] In its broadest signification it may include any right, title, or estate in, or lien on, real estate;[58] any right in or to the property dependent on a contingency.[59] In fact, the term "interest" seems to be one of extreme elasticity, which may be used to include nearly everything legally connecting claimant with the subject matter;[60] and in its plain and natural meaning it may include and compre-

c. Tenant; Tenancy

A tenant, broadly speaking, is one who holds and sesses property of another, the term being usually d with reference to real property, by any kind of . In a narrower sense it is one who has possession he premises of another in subordination to such oth- title. Tenancy is the relation of the tenant to the perty which he holds.

Jsed as a generic term,[67] in the broadest sense, a nant" is one who holds or possesses lands or ten- ents by any kind of right or title, either in fee, life, for years, at will, or on sufferance.[68] In a icter sense the term refers to one who has pos- sion of the premises of another in subordination that other's title and with his consent, express implied, as explained in the C.J.S. title Landlord l Tenant § 1, also 35 C.J. p 951 notes 1–3.

Land tenant. The person actually in possession land; otherwise styled the "terre-tenant."[69]

Tenant paravail. In the feudal system of land ure, the lowest tenant, in the process of subinfeu- ion, who cultivated the land and gathered the ps, performing his service to the next superior order.[70]

Terre-tenant. A person in actual possession or occupation of land;[71] a tenant, holder, or occupier of land;[72] also, but less frequently, the owner of the legal, as distinguished from the equitable, es- tate.[73] In a general sense, one who is seized or ac- tually possessed of lands as the owner thereof.[74]

Tenancy. Tenancy is the relation of a tenant to the land which he holds.[75] The term has two sig- nifications: (1) The estate of a tenant.[76] (2) The term or interest of a tenant,[77] although it does not necessarily imply a right to complete an exclusive possession.[78] Particular forms of tenancy are treat- ed in particular titles elsewhere in this work.

A general tenancy is one which is not fixed and made certain in point of duration by the agreement of the parties.[79]

§ 2. Nature and Incidents in General

In its primary and technical sense, "estate" refers only to an interest in land; but in its wider import it applies to all kinds of property, personal or real.

In its primary and technical sense the term "estate" refers only to an interest in land,[80] but it has acquired a much wider import and applica- tion,[81] being applied to all property of every de- scription, including personal property as well as realty,[82] and in its most extreme sense signifying everything of which riches or fortune may consist,[83] every species of property possessed by an individual or which comes into possession of his representatives after his death.[84] It has been said to denote a man's whole financial status or condition—the aggregate of his interests and concerns, so far as regards his situation with reference to wealth or its objects, including debts and obligations, as well as possessions and rights.[85] A man's estate is that which he can dispose of at his pleasure;[86] but it is not an essential element of an estate that it shall be alienable by, and subject to, the debts of the beneficial owner, in the sense that it is a logical impossibility for the estate to exist without these incidents.[87] The rules governing estates or interests in land, whether founded on statutes or on general principles of law, are, so far as practicable, applied to estates or interests of a like character in personal property.[88]

An annuity charged on an estate, properly a rent charge, is itself an estate.[89]

Choses in action are included under the term "estate," used in its broadest sense.[90] However, when used in a more restricted sense, the term has been held not to include choses in action.[91]

§ 3. Statutory Provisions

Estates in some states are regulated and controlled by statute.

In some states matters relating to estates are now regulated and controlled by statutes,[92] some of which abrogate or change the common law with respect to ownership or interests in real property,[93] and as to the alienation or conveyance of estates.[94] Only such estates as the law permits may be created in land,[95] and under some statutes there can be no other estate in lands than simple ownership of the soil and servitudes thereon, including usufruct,[96] and the owner cannot establish any other estate by will or contract.[97] The legislature may direct how contingent or vested interests coming into being in the future, may be created, divested, or sold.[98] The operation and effect of such statutory regulations, as applied to particular estates, will be treated in subsequent sections of this Title.

§ 4. Rule in Shelley's Case

Under the rule in Shelley's case, a limitation of an estate to an ancestor for life, with remainder to his heirs or the heirs of his body, gives the whole estate in fee to the ancestor.

The rule in Shelley's case, which is that where an estate is limited to an ancestor for life, with remainder either mediately or immediately to his heirs or the heirs of his body, the word "heirs" is a word of limitation and not of purchase, and the ancestor takes the whole estate in fee simple or fee tail, according to the terms of the limitation,[99] is firmly established in some states as a rule of law or property.[1] In other states, it has been abrogated by statute,[2] but such abrogation has no retrospective effect.[3] This rule, in its application, where such an estate is created by deed, is considered in Deeds § 123, and in the C.J.S. title Trusts § 186, also 65 C.J. p 540 note 29–p 541 note 40, and in the C.J.S. title Wills §§ 870–879, also 69 C.J. p 505 note 89–p 526 note 34, where such is the mode of creation of the estate.

99. U.S.—Morsman v. Commissioner

Where the rule exists, it applies only where an estate of freehold is limited to the ancestor,[4] and where the subsequent estate is limited to the heirs of the first taker, that is, to the "heirs" or "heirs of the body" as an entire class or denomination, and not merely to individuals embraced within such class;[5] it does not apply where the limitation is to "children," meaning the immediate offspring or a restricted class or number who take as purchasers.[6] As respects the application of this rule, the word "heirs" is primarily a word of limitation and not of purchase,[7] and whether it will be construed to mean "children," or whether the word "children" will be construed to mean "heirs," or "heirs of the body," depends on the particular circumstances.[8] The rule applies only where the estate in freehold and the estate in remainder are created by the same instrument,[9] and where the estates are both legal or both equitable.[10]

The rule in Shelley's case has been held to apply to realty only and not to personalty,[11] but there are decisions to the contrary.[12]

II. CLASSIFICATION

§ 5. General Statement

Estates are usually considered with regard to the quantity of the tenant's interest, the time of its enjoyment, the number and connections of the tenants, and the qualifications of the interest which may exist. Estates or interests are also classified as vested or contingent, and as legal or equitable.

Estates are usually considered: (1) With regard to the quantity of interest which the tenant has in the tenement. (2) With regard to the time at which that quantity is to be enjoyed. (3) With regard to the number and connections of the tenants.[13] They

diate interest, as distinguished from an interest the existence of which depends on a contingency,[22] as where there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to the estate on the ceasing of an intermediate or precedent estate or interest.[23]

The word "vested," even when used as descriptive of recognized legal estates, does not exclude defeasible estates.[24] It is used to denote the quality of a present estate, even though defeasible, as distinguished from that the very existence of which is contingent;[25] if there is a present right to a future possession, although that right may be defeated by some future event, contingent or certain, there is nevertheless a vested estate.[26]

An estate is contingent when a right of enjoyment is to accrue on an event which is dubious and uncertain,[27] that is, where either the person who is to enjoy it, or the event on which the estate is to arise, is uncertain.[28]

Vested, executory, or contingent interest. The term "interest," as applied to property, may be vested,[29] executory,[30] or contingent.[31] An interest is vested where there is an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment;[32] where there is a right to immediate possession on the determination of the preceding or particular estate;[33] a future interest not dependent on an uncertain period or event.[34] An equitable interest, as well as a legal interest in property may be a vested one.[35]

Future right distinguished

A "vested interest" is a present

"Executory interest" is a general term, comprising all future estates and interests in land or personalty, other than reversions or remainders.[36]

A contingent interest is one in which there is no present fixed right of either present or future enjoyment, but in which a fixed right will arise in the future under certain specified contingencies.[37]

Legal or equitable estate or interest. Estates or interests in property are also classified as legal or equitable.[38] An equitable estate or interest is an estate or interest acquired by operation of equity, or cognizable in a court of equity.[39] The term is applied to the collateral obligations of trust which were not known at law as interests in land.[40] It is not, however, strictly speaking, an interest in the land itself, but a right which can be enforced in equity;[41] that which can be sustained or made effective or available in a court of equity;[42] the interest which a man has in lands, tenements, or hereditaments which can be enforced only in a court of chancery.[43] An equitable estate is considered, to all intents and purposes, as a legal estate.[44]

A legal estate or interest is an estate or interest which can be enforced in a court of law;[45] an estate or interest vesting by operation of law on an event certain.[46] In contemplation of law there is and can be but one estate, which may properly be denominated the "legal estate,"[47] but owing to the introduction of uses and trusts there has grown up a double ownership of lands, and the interests which are cognizable as such only in a court of equity have taken the name "equitable" to distinguish them from "legal" estates.[48]

§ 6. With Regard to Quantity of Interest

With regard to quantity of interest, estates are of freehold or less than freehold.

With regard to the quantity of interest which the tenant has in the tenement, estates are classified as estates of freehold and estates less than freehold.[49]

§ 7. Estates of Freehold

An estate of freehold is an estate of indeterminate duration other than an estate at will or by sufferance. An estate of inheritance is an estate which may descend to heirs.

right or title to a thing, which carries with it an existing right of alienation, even though the right to possession or enjoyment may be postponed to some uncertain time in the future, as distinguished from a future right, which may never materialize or ripen into title.—Fidelity & Columbia Trust Co. v. An estate of freehold has been defined to be an estate of indeterminate duration other than an estate at will or by sufferance, such as an estate in fee simple, an estate for life, an estate durante viduitate, or an estate during coverture.[50] Its meaning may depend on express statutory provisions[51] or it may be used in a statute in the same sense as at common law.[52] It has been said that at common law a freehold cannot be created to commence in futuro,[53] but in some states the rule is now otherwise.[54]

Estates of freehold are either estates of inheritance or estates not of inheritance,[55] all being estates of inheritance except estates for life.[56]

Freehold of inheritance. An estate of inheritance is an estate which may descend to heirs.[57] Estates of inheritance are generally divided into inheritances absolute or fee simple, and inheritances limited.[58]

§ 8. Fee Simple

a. Definition and application of term
b. Nature and incidents

a. Definition and Application of Term

A fee simple estate is one by which a tenant holds lands, tenements, or hereditaments to himself and his heirs forever. The terms "fee," "fee simple," and "fee simple absolute" are substantially synonymous.

A tenant in fee simple is he that hath lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to hold to him and his heirs forever; generally, absolutely, and simply, without mentioning what heirs, but referring that to his own pleasure, or to the disposition of the law;[63] an estate of inheritance without condition, belonging to the owner, and alienable by him or transmissible to his heirs absolutely and simply;[64] an estate or interest in land of one holding absolute and exclusive control and dominion over it, no matter how acquired.[65] "Fee simple" and "fee" are generally used as convertible terms,[66] and it has been held that the several terms "fee," "fee simple," and "fee simple absolute" are substantially synonymous,[67] and that an absolute estate is a fee simple.[68] However, "fee simple" does not necessarily mean a "fee simple absolute,"[69] as the former term may be applied to a base or determinable fee[70] or to a fee conditional,[71] while the latter, "fee simple absolute," can be applied only to an estate which is limited absolutely to a man and his heirs and assigns forever without limitation or condition.[72] The material difference between a fee simple and other fees is that the former estate will, the latter may, continue forever.[73]

"Fee simple" is a common-law term corresponding to what in the civil law is a "perfect title;"[74] and the term "fee simple absolute" means a perfect title; the entire and absolute interest and property in the land, from which it follows that no one can have a greater estate.[75]

A fee-simple estate may be either legal or equitable,[76] as the term "fee simple" is not generally used to distinguish between legal and equitable estates, but is used to denote the quantity or duration of estates, whether the enjoyment is limited or unlimited in point of continuance or duration.[77]

Ordinarily the term "fee" or "fee simple" applies to an estate in land, but it may be applied to any kind of hereditament, corporeal or incorporeal.[78]

"Fee" and "power of disposition" distinguished. There is a wide distinction between a title in fee and a power to dispose of property, as under the latter the fee is not in the donee, but he has a dominion over the fee, which he may exercise at his option and on his failure to exercise it the fee never rests in him.[79] Under some statutes, however, where an absolute power of disposition, not accompanied by any trusts, is given to the owner of a particular estate for life or for years, such estate is changed into a fee absolute with respect to the rights of creditors and purchasers, but subject to any future estate limited thereon, in case the power is not executed.[80]

Lay fee. A fee held by ordinary feudal tenure, as distinguished from the ecclesiastical tenure of frankalmoign, by which an ecclesiastical corporation held of the donor.[81]

A title in fee or fee simple is a full and absolute estate, beyond and outside of which there is no other interest or right;[88] a title to the whole of the thing absolutely;[89] it is an indefeasible title or estate, in which is blended the right of possession and the right of property.[90]

extent that they are necessary to accomplish some purpose which justifies a departure from such policy.[96]

A general restraint on alienation, whether by deed or will, is undoubtedly void.[97] The rule against such restraints, however, applies only where the grant in the first instance conveys an absolute fee-simple estate,[98] and not where the original grantor does not part with all the incidents of the fee,[99] as where he conveys only a base or qualified fee.[1]

Limited or partial restraint. The rule against restraint on alienation has been held not to apply with respect to a restraint which is limited or partial,[2] and not inconsistent with the reasonable enjoyment of the fee.[3] However, in order to make a partial or limited restriction on alienation good, there must be a provision for a reversion or limitation over on violation of the restricting clause.[4]

Reasonable restraint. The rule prevailing in some states is that a reasonable restraint may be imposed on alienation,[5] what is a reasonable restraint being a matter for determination on the particular circumstances of each case.[6]

Restraint for limited time. According to some decisions, a restraint on the alienation of such an estate, for a limited time, is void;[7] but there are decisions[8] and dicta[9] to the contrary.

Restraint to particular persons. It has also been held that a restraint against alienation to a particular person or class of persons is valid,[10] but there is authority to the contrary.[11] If the restriction allows alienation only to certain persons or classes of persons, it is invalid.[12]

Restraint to control of other person. A restriction which makes the right to alien a fee subject to the control of other persons is invalid.[13]

Contract to take advice of other person as to time most advantageous for sale held not restraint on alienation.—Epstean v. Mintz, 198 N.W. 225, 226 Mich. 660.

Restraint as to repurchase. A stipulation in a deed prohibiting the purchaser from alienating the land without giving the vendor the privilege of repurchasing is void,[14] and so likewise is a condition in a deed that the grantee alienating shall pay part of the price received to the grantor.[15]

A prohibition against partition is not a restraint on alienation, as each tenant in common may convey his share at pleasure.[16] However, it has been held that if such a provision is treated as a restraint on alienation it is void.[17]

Restraint as to equitable fee. In some states equity follows the rule of law as to restraints on alienation,[18] but in other states, in case of the devise of an equitable fee in land, limitations against alienation are valid.[19]

§ 9. Limited or Conditional Fees in General

A limited fee is one which has some limitation or condition annexed to it whereby it is determinable. It is either a qualified or base fee, or a fee conditional.

A limited fee simple is such as has some collateral matter annexed to it whereby it is made by some means determinable, as by limitation or condition.[20] Limited or conditional fees are of two kinds: (1) Qualified or base fees. (2) Fees conditional, so called at the common law; and afterward fees tail, in consequence of the statute de donis.[21]

§ 10. Base, Qualified, or Determinable Fee

A base, qualified, or determinable fee is a fee which has a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined when such qualification is at an end. Until its determination such a fee has all the incidents of a fee simple. On its determination the property reverts to the grantor without any claim or act on his part.

Although distinctions have been made or discussed by some authorities,[22] the terms "base fee," "qualified fee," and "determinable fee" are generally used interchangeably[23] to denote a fee which has a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end.[24] This estate is a fee, because by possibility it may endure forever in a man and his heirs; yet as that duration depends on the concurrence of collateral circumstances which qualify and debase the purity of the donation it is therefore a qualified or base fee.[25]

(4) A fee "which may continue forever, but is liable to be deter-

The qualification annexed to a base, qualified, or determinable fee may be either one of two kinds: (1) It may be a qualification which attaches itself to the use of the land, so that the estate is held to be granted for that use and purpose only, and on the cessation of the use the estate expires.[26] (2) It may be one which is concerned with the happening of a more strictly collateral event, in that case leaving the use of the estate free for any purpose, but limiting its existence only by the event contemplated, or to the continuance of the state of affairs contemplated at the time of the grant.[27] The mere expression of a purpose for which the land is to be used will not of itself debase a fee,[28] but where an estate is conveyed in fee for a specified purpose "and no other" the fee is a base fee determinable on cessation of the use of the property for that purpose.[29] This also results where the estate is to endure while, or so long as, the land is used for a specified purpose[30] and shall revert to the grantor,[31] or vest in other persons named,[32] when it shall cease to be used for this purpose. The qualification on which the estate is to determine must be found in the instrument creating the estate,[33] but no especial or technical words are required to establish it,[34] except that they must be words of limitation as distinguished from words of condition.[35]

Contingency impossible. If the happening of the event on which the estate is to be determined becomes impossible, it is converted into an estate in fee simple.[36]

until the qualification on which it is limited is at an end, the grantee or proprietor has the same rights and privileges over his estate as though it were a fee simple.[38] He has an absolute right to the exclusive possession, use, and enjoyment of the land and as complete dominion over it for all purposes as though he held it in fee simple.[39] He is not, as a general rule, liable for waste,[40] but if such an estate consists of personalty, he would be liable if he should consume it or any part of it, and then his estate would be defeated by the occurrence of the condition imposed.[41]

A base, qualified, or determinable fee is an estate of inheritance, descendible to heirs,[42] and is subject to assignment,[43] devise,[44] or conveyance.[45] The owner of such a fee cannot, however, alone convey a perfect title in fee simple to the property,[46] and if he conveys in fee the determinable quality of the estate follows the transfer;[47] but an indefeasible title in fee simple may be conveyed if those who would take the estate on the contingency by which his estate would be defeated join with him in the conveyance.[48]

Right of grantor. On the determination of such a fee the property reverts to the grantor as explained infra § 105, without any claim or act on his part,[49] no reëntry being necessary.[50] In the meantime, as explained infra § 105, the whole estate is vested in the grantee and all that remains to the grantor is the mere possibility of reverter which it has been decided is incapable of alienation or devise, although it may descend to his heirs.

Distinctions. A base or determinable fee is distinguished from a life estate in that the incidents are different,[51] as by the fact that, while the former may last forever, the latter terminates absolutely on the death of the life tenant.[52] A base or determinable fee is also distinguished from an estate for years by the fact that the latter terminates at the end of a fixed and definite period;[53] from a fee on condition subsequent in that an entry is necessary to terminate the latter, but not the former;[54] and from a conditional fee, in that the former is confined to a person as tenant of a particular place, whereas the latter is restrained to particular heirs.[55]

Present status. Base or qualified fees are still recognized[56] and were not done away with by the statute quia emptores.[57]

§ 11. Fees Conditional

A fee conditional restrains the fee to particular heirs. It is a fee simple on condition that the donee has issue, and in default thereof reverts to the donor, the entire estate being in the donee with a possibility of reverter in the donor. After birth of issue the estate becomes absolute, with the usual incidents, such as alienability and liability for debts.

A conditional fee is one which restrains the fee to some particular heirs, exclusive of others, as to the heirs of a man's body, or to the heirs male of his body.[58] This estate has been held to be a fee simple on condition that the donee has issue,[59] and with the further condition that in default of such issue it shall revert to the donor.[60]

Interest of donor, donee, and issue. Until the condition under which the fee is broken arises, in a fee conditional the entire estate is in the donee, the donor having a mere possibility of reverter[61] which he may release to the donee and thereby convert the estate into a fee simple absolute.[62] The issue is not regarded as having any interest whatever.[63]

Effect of birth of issue. As soon as any issue is born the estate is supposed to become absolute by the performance of the condition, at least for three purposes: (1) To enable the tenant to alien the

Named only as qualification

"The heirs of the body, in a grant of a fee conditional, are named, not for any benefit intended to them, but to qualify the estate of their ancestor and fix the course of descent, if he makes no disposition. As against him they have no rights."—Pearse v. Killian, supra.

land and thereby to bar, not only his own issue, but also the donor of his interest in the reversion. (2) To subject him to forfeit it for treason, which he could not do until issue was born, longer than for his own life, lest thereby the inheritance of the issue and reversion of the donor might have been defeated. (3) To empower him to charge the land with rents, commons, and certain other encumbrances, so as to bind his issue.[64]

Alienation before, as well as after, the birth of issue is sufficient to bar the rights of such issue,[65] but not the donor's right of reverter.[66] If the alienation is before the birth of issue and then the issue dies before the tenant in fee conditional, who has alienated, this does not prevent the reverter to the donor.[67] After the birth of issue alienation passes the entire estate and bars the donor's reverter,[68] even though the alienation does not take place until after the death of the issue.[69] Since the reverter to the donor was not barred in case there was no alienation after the birth of issue,[70] it became customary for the grantee, on the birth of issue, to alien and then repurchase, so that he might become vested with a fee simple absolute that would descend to his heirs generally.[71] To prevent this the statute de donis conditionalibus was passed which took away from the donee the power of alienation,[72] and left in him an estate called a fee tail.[73] If the fee conditional is not alienated during the life of the grantee after birth of issue, the estate descends, not to the heirs generally, but to the bodily issue of the grantee.[74]

Dower and curtesy. As an estate of inheritance, a fee conditional is subject to both dower[75] and curtesy.[76]

Devise. An estate in fee conditional cannot be devised.[77]

Liability for debts. A fee conditional estate is bound, after the birth of issue, by the lien of a judgment or decree against the tenant in fee in bar of all the rights of the issue[78] and, in the hands of the heirs of the body after the death of the first taker, constitutes assets for the payment of the debts of such first taker even though not reduced to judgment.[79]

In equity. A fee conditional estate may exist in equity as a trust or use as well as in law, and, when thus existing in equity, is subject to all the rules of descent and otherwise, and is accompanied by most of the incidents and attributes applicable to such estates at law.[80]

Status. In some states the existence of this estate, at the present time, is expressly recognized,[81]

The statute de donis preventing alienation of estates, repudiated at common law, is contrary to the spirit of the institutions, and cannot be held a part of the laws of such states.—Yates v. Yates, 178 N.W. 262, 104 Neb. 678—21 C.J. p 926 note 9 [a].

while in others it has never been recognized,[82] and in others it has been converted by statute to an unqualified fee-simple estate.[83]

§ 12. Estates Less than Freehold

Estates less than freehold include estates for years, estates at will, and estates by sufferance, and are regarded as chattels real.

Estates less than freehold are, as the term signifies, estates or interests in land less than a freehold.[84] They are of three sorts: Estates for years, estates at will, and estates by sufferance.[85] An estate for years arises where one contracts for the possession of lands or tenements for some determinate period.[86] An estate at will arises where lands or tenements are let by one person to another without the limitation of any certain or determinate estate;[87] it is an estate at the will of either party.[88] An estate by sufferance arises where one comes into possession of land by lawful title, but keeps it afterward without any title at all.[89]

Such estates are regarded as chattel interests, that is, interests in incorporeal hereditaments, not amounting to freeholds, as distinguished from freehold interests;[90] and are regarded as "chattels real," that is estates or interests which are annexed to or concern real estate,[91] and include all estates and interests in real property less than estates of freehold.[92]

Copyhold estate. Copyhold estates were originally nothing better than mere estates at will, but successive lords of manors having permitted these estates to be enjoyed by the tenants and their heirs according to particular custom established in their respective districts, they became as properly tenants by the custom as tenants at will, the custom having arisen from a series of uniform wills.[93]

§ 13. With Regard to Time of Enjoyment

With regard to time of enjoyment, estates are either in possession or in expectancy.

Estates with regard to the time of their enjoyment are divided into estates in possession and estates in expectancy.[94]

§ 14. Estates in Possession

An estate in possession is one whereby a present interest passes to, and resides in, the tenant, independent of any subsequent circumstance or contingency.

Estates in possession are, as defined at common law, those whereby a present interest passes to and resides in the tenant, not depending on any subsequent circumstance or contingency.[95] Under some statutes an estate in possession is where the owner

§ 15. Estates in Expectancy

a. In general
b. Future estates

a. In General

An estate in expectancy is where the right to possession or enjoyment is postponed to a future period. It is subject to descent, devise, or alienation.

An estate in expectancy is where the right to the possession or enjoyment is postponed to a future period,[97] although the estate or interest has a present legal existence.[98] Estates in expectancy are usually of two kinds; one created by the act of the parties, called a remainder; the other by act of law, and called a reversion.[99] To these a third, executory limitations, has sometimes been added, as discussed infra § 119.[1]

Descent, devise, and alienation. Under some statutes, expectant estates, including expectant estates in personalty,[2] are descendible, devisable, and alienable in the same manner as estates in possession.[3] All such estates, contingent as well as vested, are included,[4] so far as the nature of the contingency admits.[5] However, the mere possibility of a reverter which the grantor has after he has conveyed in fee on condition subsequent is not included.[6]

b. Future Estates

A future estate is one limited to commence in possession or enjoyment in the future. It is vested if there is a person in being who would have an immediate right to possession on the ceasing of the intermediate or precedent estate. It is contingent while the person to whom or the event on which it is limited to take effect remains uncertain.

Under some statutes, estates in expectancy are divided into future estates and reversions,[7] future estates including all remainders, whether vested or contingent.[8] Under such statutes a future estate is an estate limited to commence in possession or enjoyment at a future day, either without the intervention of a precedent estate, or on the determination by lapse of time or otherwise, of a precedent estate created at the same time.[9] When future estates are dependent on preceding estates they are termed remainders.[10] The same rules which regulate future estates in land are made applicable to the creation and limitation of future estates in personal property.[11]

§ 16. With Regard to Number and Connection of Tenants

With regard to the number and connection of the tenants, estates are in severalty or in plurality.

With reference to the number and connection of the tenants, estates are either estates in severalty or estates in plurality, as discussed in the following sections.[17]

§ 17. Estates in Severalty

An estate in severalty is one held by a person in his own right alone.

A tenant in severalty or sole tenant is one who holds real property in his own right alone, without any other person being joined or connected with him in point of interest during his estate therein.[18] This is the most common and usual way of holding an estate, and all estates are supposed to be of this sort unless they are expressly declared to be otherwise.[19]

Severalty, as applied to tenants, is a technical word meaning a sole, separate, and exclusive dominion.[20]

§ 18. Estates in Plurality

Estates in plurality are designated as estates in joint tenancy, tenancy in common, coparcenary, and estates by entirety.

Estates in plurality or coöwnership are designated as estates in joint tenancy, estates in tenancy in common, and estates in coparcenary, respectively.[21] To this enumeration is sometimes added tenancy by entirety, which is a species of joint tenancy and occurs at common law when a gift or conveyance which, if made to two strangers, would create a

Right to undisposed profits

The purpose of a statutory provision respecting rights to undisposed profits arising in connection with creation of certain estates is to allow him who is to take a future estate also to take the income in interim pending vesting in possession of his estate where such income is not given to another, it being presumed that donor of property may naturally be supposed to intend that income should go to the same person to whom he had given that out of which income arises.—In re O'Hanlon's Will, 27 N.Y.S.2d 889.

"Expectancy" distinguished

A contingent interest is distinguished from an expectancy, which is defined as a bare hope of succession to the property of another such as may be entertained by an heir apparent. Such a hope is inchoate, it has no attribute of property, is without appreciable value, and the interest to which it relates is nonexistent, and may never exist. A contingent interest, on the other hand, is an actual creation whose existence may be cut off by few or many contingencies but whose very existence gives it a possible value.—In re Robbins, 49 A. 233, 199 Pa. 500.

§ 20. Estates upon Condition

a. Definition and nature
b. Classification
c. Requisites of conditions
d. Conditions and limitations distinguished
e. Conditional limitations

a. Definition and Nature

An estate on condition is an estate whose existence depends on the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, whereby the estate may be either originally created, enlarged, or finally defeated.

Estates on condition are those whose existence depends on the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, whereby the estate may be either originally created, enlarged, or finally defeated.[23] Such conditions may be annexed to every species of estate or interest in real property,[24] including a fee,[25] and therefore are more properly qualifications of other estates than a distinct species of themselves.[26] An estate is an unconditional estate when the quality thereof is not limited or affected by any condition.[27]

A condition, as used in estates law, is a qualification, restriction, or limitation defeating, terminating, or enlarging an estate granted;[28] a qualification or restriction annexed to a deed or devise, by virtue of which an estate is made to vest, to be enlarged or defeated on the happening or not happening of a particular event, or the performance or nonperformance of a particular act.[29]

Estates on condition are divided into estates on condition implied or in law, and estates on condition expressed or in deed,[30] and are further divided into estates on condition precedent and estates on condition subsequent.[31]

Condition implied. Estates on condition implied in law are where the grant of an estate has a condition annexed to it inseparably, from its essence and constitution, although no condition be expressed in words,[32] the implied condition being one which the law implies either from its being always understood to be annexed to certain estates, or as annexed to estates held under certain circumstances.[33]

Condition expressed. An express condition, or, as otherwise termed, a condition in fact,[34] is one declared in terms in the deed or instrument by which the estate is created,[35] and an estate on condition expressed in the grant or devise itself is where the estate granted has a qualification annexed, whereby the estate shall commence, be enlarged, or defeated, on performance or breach of such qualification or condition.[36] Under estates on condition expressed or in deed may be included estates in vadio, gage, or pledge, estates by statute merchant or statute staple, and estates by elegit.[37]

Estates in vadio, gage, or pledge. Estates in gage or pledge are of two kinds, vivum vadium, or living pledge, and mortuum vadium, dead pledge or mortgage.[38] Vivum vadium, or living pledge, so called because neither the debt nor the estate is lost,[39] is a species of security by which a borrower of a sum of money makes over his estate to the lender until he has received that sum out of the issues and profits of his land;[40] the land survives the debt, and when the debt is discharged, the land by right of reverter returns to the original owner.[41]

(2) Conditions Precedent

A condition precedent, as distinguished from a condition subsequent, is a condition which must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged.

Conditions precedent are such as must happen or be performed before the estate can vest or be enlarged.[42] The effect of the nonperformance of a condition precedent is to prevent the estate granted under such condition from ever vesting in the grantee,[43] and the general rule is that, where an estate is to vest on the happening of an event it must be shown that the event has taken place, and if the event consists of several particulars it must be shown that every particular has been performed.[44]

Conditions precedent and subsequent compared and distinguished. The question as to whether conditions are precedent or subsequent is a matter of construction,[45] there being no technical words to distinguish between them.[46] The same words may be construed to operate, either as the one or the other, according to the evident sense in which they are used, as indicated by the instrument.[47] The true test therefore, it is said, is that of the intention of the parties to the instrument, creating the condition or estate.[48] This intention is to be gathered from the context of the instrument, read in those lights which are properly employed in the construction of writings.[49] It is not always easy to determine whether a condition is precedent or subsequent. One general rule will, however, solve most cases: If the thing conditioned is to exist or happen before the estate is to vest, the condition is precedent; if after, it is subsequent.[50] Whether the condition is precedent or subsequent may be determined from the nature of the acts to be done, and the order in which they must necessarily precede and follow each other in the progress of performance.[51]

(3) Conditions Subsequent

A condition subsequent is a condition by the failure or nonperformance of which an estate already vested may be defeated.

A condition subsequent is such by the failure or nonperformance of which an estate already vested may be defeated.[52] This rule applies to a condition subsequent to a fee simple title,[53] and the grantee may have an estate of freehold so long as the condition remains unbroken, provided the estate on which such condition is annexed is itself a freehold.[54] In case of a condition subsequent, the estate is given absolutely, without limitation, grantor having no estate left which he may either alienate or devise,[55] but the title is subject to be divested by

Condition is condition subsequent, where the performance of it does not necessarily precede the vesting of the estate, but may accompany or follow it, and the act may as well be done after as before the vesting of the estate, or where from the nature of the act and the time required for its performance it is evident that the intention of the parties was that the estate should vest and the act be performed after the taking of possession by the grantee or devisee.

the happening or not happening of the contingency,[56] and if the condition is expressed, the right of reëntry for a breach thereof follows without an express reservation or stipulation to that effect.[57]

The effect of the nonperformance or breach of a condition subsequent is not ipso facto to produce a reverter of title,[58] but to render the estate granted liable to forfeiture, at the option of the person entitled to take advantage of such breach.[59] To have any effect on the estate the condition, on breach thereof, must be taken advantage of, by reëntry or claim, by the grantor or his heirs or other person to whom the right so to do belongs;[60] and it may be stated as a general rule, that with the breach of a condition a stranger has nothing to do and a court will not examine at his request,[61] or in a collateral proceeding,[62] the question whether a condition has been broken and a forfeiture incurred.

Estates on condition subsequent have until defeated the same qualities and incidents as though no condition was annexed thereto,[63] but if conveyed or devised they pass subject to the condition.[64]

Conditions subsequent are not favored by the law and are construed strictly because they tend to destroy estates,[65] and therefore may be created only by apt and appropriate language, which establishes that only a conditional estate was conveyed.[66]

c. Requisites of Conditions

A condition annexed to an estate must be legal and possible, and generally must be expressed in the instrument creating the estate.

The condition annexed to the estate must be legal and possible,[67] and generally must be expressed in the grant or devise creating the estate.[68] The condition is void, and its performance will be excused, if it is impossible at the time of its creation,[69] or afterward becomes so by the act of God,[70] or of the grantor,[71] or if it is contrary to law[72] or to public policy,[73] or repugnant to the nature of the estate.[74] In such cases if the condition is a condition subsequent the effect is to vest the estate in the grantee, discharged from the condition;[75] but if a condition precedent is void the estate dependent thereon is also void, and the grantee takes nothing by the grant.[76] If a condition precedent is impossible the estate will not vest.[77]

d. Conditions and Limitations Distinguished

A condition is distinguished from a limitation in that in case of a condition the estate continues beyond the breach of the condition until the grantor or his heirs take advantage of the breach, to avoid the estate, whereas, in case of a limitation, the estate determines as soon as the contingency happens, without any act on the part of the person next in expectancy.

The distinction between a condition and a limitation is technical, but clear.[78] The distinction is that in the case of a limitation the estate determines as soon as the contingency happens, without any act on the part of him who is next in expectancy, while in the case of a condition the estate continues beyond the happening of the contingency, unless grantor or his heirs take advantage of the breach of the condition and make an entry or claim in order to avoid the estate.[79] A condition terminates an estate; a limitation creates a new one.[80] Words of limitation mark the period which is to determine the estate; but words of condition render the estate liable to be defeated in the intermediate time, if the event expressed in the condition arises before the determination of the estate, or completion of the period prescribed by the limitation.[81] A condition sub-

Other statement of distinction
"Where an estate is so expressly limited by the words of its creation that it cannot endure for any longer time than until the contingency happens upon which the estate is to fail, this is a limitation; but when an estate is expressly granted upon condition in deed, the law permits it to endure beyond the time of the contingency happening, unless the grantor takes advantage of the breach of condition, by making en-

sequent brings the estate back to the grantor or his heirs; a conditional limitation carries it over to a stranger.[82]

Special limitation is a qualification serving to mark out the bounds of an estate, so as to determine it ipso facto in a given event without action, entry, or claim, before it would, or might, otherwise expire by force of, or according to, the general limitation.[83]

e. Conditional Limitations

A conditional limitation is an estate limited to take effect after the determination of another estate, which, in the absence of a limitation over, would have been an estate on condition.

A conditional limitation is an estate limited to take effect after the determination of an estate, which, in the absence of a limitation over, would have been an estate on condition.[84] If a condition subsequent is followed by a limitation over on a noncompliance with or a breach of the condition, it is termed a conditional limitation.[85] The estate is of a mixed nature, partaking both of a condition and of a limitation;[86] of a condition, because it defeats the estate previously limited; and of a limitation, because on the happening of the contingency, the estate passes to the person having the next expectant interest without entry or claim.[87] Conditional limitations were not recognized by the common law and could only be created so as to become valid and effectual under the statutes of uses.[88]

III. ESTATES TAIL

§ 21. Definition and Nature

A "fee tail" or "estate tail" is an estate of inheritance which, instead of descending to heirs generally, goes only to heirs of the donee's body.

Estates tail are estates of inheritance which, instead of descending to heirs generally, go to the heirs of the donee's body, which means his lawful issue, his children, and through them to his grandchildren in a direct line, so long as his posterity endures in a regular order and course of descent, and on the extinction of such issue the estate determines.[89] The indefinite failure of issue which is an essential ingredient of a fee tail[90] means a failure of issue which may occur at any time rather than at any fixed time.[91] An estate tail like an estate in fee simple may depend for its continuance on the performance of a condition or may be defeated by the happening of a contingency.[92]

The donor is left with a reversionary interest in the fee; on the failure of issue, the estate reverts to the donor.[93]

§ 22. Origin and Status

Estates tail originated with the statute de donis. While adopted as a part of the English common law they are now recognized in but a few jurisdictions.

Estates tail had their origin in the statute de donis conditionalibus (3 Edw. I c 1) which abolished fees conditional and substituted therefor fees tail.[94]

Estates tail are not favored because of the delay in the vesting of title[95] and in some states have never been recognized,[96] but they were generally accepted with the other parts of English jurisprudence,[97] and in a few states still exist,[98] but as stated infra § 29, they have been abolished or materially modified by statute in most jurisdictions.

§ 23. Classification

Estates tail are classified as general or special.

Estates tail are either general or special, according to whether the limitation is to the heirs of the donee's body generally, or to certain specified heirs, coming within that description, to the exclusion of others;[99] but the specified heirs must be lineal heirs, as an estate tail can be created only by a gift to the donee and the heirs of his body begotten.[1] Estates in general and special tail may both of them be either in tail male or tail female.[2]

§ 24. Creation in General

Estates tail may be created by deed, see Deeds § 111, or by will, see the C.J.S. title Wills §§ 861–869, also 69 C.J. p 492 note 55–p 505 note 87.

§ 25. What May Be Entailed

Personalty cannot be entailed.

Mere personal chattels cannot be entailed;[3] and a limitation which would create an estate tail as to realty gives the first donee an absolute estate in personalty.[4]

§ 26. Incidents

Estates tail have progressively taken on more and more of the incidents of an estate in fee simple.

Originally an estate tail was not chargeable with the debts or obligations of the tenant after his death;[5] but by statute the estate was made liable for the debts of the tenant to the crown due by record or special contract, and still later they were made liable for all his debts in case of bankruptcy.[6] In some jurisdictions such an estate is by statute generally liable for the debts of the tenant.[7] In any event an estate tail may be sold under execution to raise funds to pay a charge imposed by the instrument creating the estate.[8] Until the rule was modified by statute, estates tail were not liable to forfeiture for treason or felony.[9] The tenant in tail was not liable for waste.[10]

An estate tail was subject to both curtesy, see Curtesy § 11e, and dower, see Dower § 26a.

Alienation. Originally a tenant in tail could not alienate the estate for a period longer than his life and he could not devise it.[11] He could of course lease it for a period within his own tenure.[12] However, as discussed infra § 27, the courts and the legislatures have created a number of ways whereby the tenant in tail can convey a fee simple. Moreover the right to bar the entail in one of these ways, by a common recovery, became an inseparable incident to estates tail, one which could not be restrained by condition, limitation, custom, recognizance, or covenant.[13] A tenant in tail cannot divest himself of the power of barring the entail by a covenant with the remainderman that he will not use such power.[14]

§ 27. Bar or Defeat of Estate

A variety of methods of barring an estate tail have been evolved by the courts and the legislatures, as means of a common recovery, lease, or fine and in more recent times by deed or mortgage.

Common recovery. The first relief against the evils incident to estates tail was procured through the courts in the decision of Taltarum's case (Y. B. 12 Edw. IV pp 14, 19)[15] in which it was decided that an estate tail might be barred by a fictitious proceeding called a common recovery which was introduced to elude the statute de donis,[16] and this decision having been generally acquiesced in, common recoveries became the regular mode of conveyance by which the tenant in tail might dispose of his land and tenements.[17] A common recovery duly executed passed an absolute estate defeating not only the rights of the tenant in tail but those in remainder and reversion.[18] It let in all the preceding encumbrances of the tenant, and rendered valid all the acts of ownership which he had exercised over the estate.[19] Common recoveries were introduced into this country and allowed as a means of barring estates tail,[20] but have now very generally been done away with under the statutory provisions relating to these estates.[21]

Lease. The next mode of barring estates tail was by virtue of a statute, where by certain leases made by tenants in tail, not prejudicial to the issue, were allowed to be good in law and bind the issue in tail.[22]

Fine. A later statute provided that a fine duly levied by the tenant in tail should be a complete bar to him and his heirs, and all persons claiming under the entail.[23] Fines as a means of barring estates tail were recognized in this country in a few of the states until they were abolished by statute.[24]

Appointment to charitable uses. A later statute, commonly called the statute of charitable uses, was so construed by the courts that an appointment by the tenant in tail of the land entailed to a charitable use was good without fine or recovery.[25] It has been held that this means of barring estates tail is not recognized in this country.[26]

Deed. At common law if a tenant in tail, by bargain and sale, lease and release, covenant to stand seized, or other conveyance operating by way of grant, conveyed to another and his heirs, the grantee had a base fee simple, determinable after the death of the tenant in tail by the entry of the issue in tail.[27] By virtue of statutory enactments or judicial decision the tenant in tail may now generally convey the estate by deed and thus bar the entail.[28] The

(2) It has been held that a deed properly executed and recorded is effectual to bar an estate tail, although executed merely for this purpose, for a nominal consideration, and on an express trust that the grantee shall immediately reconvey to the grantor.—Lawrence v. Lawrence, 105 Pa. 335.

A sale and conveyance by the trustee of a lunatic who is a tenant in tail, made by order of court, will pass a good title in fee simple.—In re Reeves, 94 A. 511, 10 Del.Ch. 483, affirming 92 A. 246, 10 Del.Ch. 324.

deed must be executed[29] and recorded[30] in the manner provided by statute, and have proper parties legally capable of contracting.[31] According to most authorities seizin by the tenant in tail which was essential to the earlier modes of barring the entail is also an essential requisite of this mode;[32] a deed will not be effectual to bar the entail if made by a tenant in tail in remainder[33] or by the heir in tail during his ancestor's lifetime.[34] It has been held, however, that the requirement of seizin is an absolute subtlety.[35] A tenant in tail instead of defeating the estate tail altogether may convey only a limited interest therein, and on the expiration of the particular interest will again take the estate tail as originally held.[36] The deed of the tenant in tail may convey to the grantee an absolute estate in fee simple,[37] and bar not only the estate tail but also all remainders and reversions,[38] contingent interests,[39] and executory devises over,[40] and does not, as in the case of a common recovery, let in prior encumbrances.[41] The sale and conveyance by a sheriff on execution of a judgment against a tenant in tail, of the land of the tenant in tail, does not bar the entail,[42] and after such a sale and conveyance the tenant in tail may himself execute a deed for the purpose of barring the entail.[43]

Mortgage. A tenant in tail can execute a mortgage valid for the duration of his tenure.[44] Under a statute authorizing an absolute conveyance by deed a mortgage deed does not of itself bar the entail, as the whole estate is not thereby conveyed,[45] and if the mortgage debt is paid it seems that the old estate is again revived;[46] but if it is not, a sale of the equity of redemption passes the entire remaining interest and bars the entail.[47]

Adverse possession. It has been usually held that adverse possession, for the statutory period, will bar both the tenant in tail and the issue in tail.[48] When the statute of limitations once begins to run against an heir in tail, no subsequent event can interrupt its progress;[49] and when it has run for the statutory period no formedon can afterward be maintained.[50]

Judicial authorization. In some jurisdictions, the court may authorize the alienation of a fee tail when satisfied that such sale will not substantially injure the heirs in tail.[51] In such proceeding, unborn issue are represented by living issue[52] or by the tenant.[53]

Provisions in instrument creating entail. The original grantor, in creating an entail, may in the same instrument provide the means by which it may be barred,[54] and, where a devise of an estate tail charges the estate with the payment of a legacy, a sale under an execution for the purpose of raising the legacy passes a fee simple to the purchaser and extinguishes the entail.[55]

Equitable estates tail. The rule in England that an equitable estate tail can be barred in equity precisely as a legal estate tail can be barred at law has never been followed in this country and authority must be found, if at all, in statutory enactment.[56]

The right to bar an estate tail is not property; it is an incident of the estate a privilege bestowed by the statute on a tenant in tail, which he may or may not assert.[57]

§ 28. Estate Tail after Possibility of Issue Extinct

An estate tail after possibility of issue extinct has incidents of both an estate tail and one for life.

An estate tail after possibility of issue extinct partakes partly of the nature of an estate for life and partly of the nature of an estate in fee tail.[58] The holder of such estate is not punishable for waste.[59]

§ 29. Statutory Abolition or Modification

Estates tail have been abolished by statute in most jurisdictions.

In most jurisdictions, as the result of statutory enactments, estates tail have been either entirely abolished or greatly modified.[60] In some jurisdictions they have been converted into estates in fee simple in the hands of the first taker;[61] while in others the first taker has only a life estate with remainder in fee simple, variously disposed of, as to his issue,[62] children,[63] or those to whom the estate would pass according to the common law on the death of the first taker.[64] In Connecticut the conditional fee of the common law was never recognized nor the statute de donis conditionalibus adopted but estates tail may be created by words appropriate to their creation at common law,[65] and the rule in that state, as confirmed by statute, is that such words vest a fee simple in the issue of the first donee in tail, such issue taking no interest in the land during the life of the donee, and the donee having no alienable interest beyond a life interest.[66] A statute, which operates to destroy an entail, supporting a remainder, necessarily destroys the remainder expectant thereon.[67] The two statutes which have been generally enacted in the several states respectively converting fees tail into fees simple, and abolishing the rule in Shelley's Case, are not inconsistent; the former applies where, by the terms of the instrument conferring the estate, it goes to the person mentioned, and the heirs of his body, while the latter applies where the terms of the instrument purport to create a life estate in the first taker, with remainder to his heirs, or to the heirs of his body.[68]

§ 30. Definition, Nature, and Regulation

A life estate is a freehold interest in lands, the duration of which is confined to the life or lives of some particular person or persons or to the happening or not happening of some uncertain event.

is a freehold,[71] whether for the tenant's own life or for that of another person.[72] Such an estate may be made to depend on a contingency, on the happening of which the estate may be entirely defeated before the death of the grantee,[73] for example, if an estate is given to a woman during widowhood,[74] or to a person so long as he shall dwell in a particular place[75] or shall use the granted premises for a specified purpose,[76] in which last case it has been held that the grant must be to a natural person and not to a corporation.[77] The indefinite duration of the estate and the fact that it may continue for life places it within the category of estates for life;[78] it matters not how contingent or uncertain the duration of the estate may be, or how probable is its termination in a limited number of years, if it is capable of enduring for the term of a life.[79]

A tenant for life is one to whom lands or tenements are granted or devised, or to which he derives title by operation of law for the term of his own life, or the life of another;[80] where a grant of an estate is made to a man for the term of his own life, or for that of another person, he is so called.[81] The life tenant possesses legal title.[82]

§ 31. Classification

a. In general
b. Legal life estates
c. Conventional life estates

a. In General

Life estates are either conventional or legal.

Estates for life are either conventional, which are created by the acts of the parties, or legal, which are created by operation of law.[83]

b. Legal Life Estates

Legal life estate are those created by operation of law.

Legal life estates are those made by operation of law.[84] Such estates are curtesy, discussed in the C.J.S. title Curtesy § 1, dower, considered as a life estate in the C.J.S. title Dower, §§ 1, 6, and, in some jurisdictions, homesteads, discussed in the C.J.S. title Homesteads § 3, also 29 C.J. p 784 note 36.

c. Conventional Life Estates

(1) In general
(2) Estates pur autre vie

(1) In General

Conventional life estates are those created by act, contract, or convention of the parties.

Conventional life estates are those made by act, contract, or convention of the parties.[85] They are naturally subdivided into: An estate to the tenant for his own life;[86] an estate to the tenant for the life of some other person called an estate pur autre vie;[87] and an estate for an uncertain period which is not inheritable nor at will and may last for life.[88]

(2) Estates pur Autre Vie

An estate pur autre vie is an estate for the life of some person other than the tenant himself. It is not an estate of inheritance.

An estate pur autre vie is an estate for the life of some person other than the tenant himself,[89] and the person on whose life the duration of the estate depends is called the cestui que vie.[90] An estate pur autre vie is not an estate of inheritance,[91] and before the statute of frauds was not devisable.[92]

Occupancy. At common law, if a tenant pur autre vie died in the lifetime of the cestui que vie, any person might enter upon the land and lawfully retain the possession thereof so long as the cestui que vie lived, by right of occupancy, and was called the general or common occupant.[93] In some jurisdictions it has been held that the wife and family or next of kin of a tenant pur autre vie who dies during the lifetime of the cestui que vie are entitled to continue in possession of the property during the remainder of the latter's life;[94] both in England and in the United States the disposition of the residue of an estate pur autre vie is generally regulated by statute.[95]

§ 32. Creation

Life estates may be created by express words or by implication.

Life estates, created by the acts of the parties, need not be by express words, but may be by implication or judicial construction.[96] The use of the term "life estate" is not necessary to create such an estate, but the intention to create a life estate may be expressed in any equivalent and appropriate language.[97] A life estate may be created not only by an express limitation to that effect but by a general grant without defining any specific interest or estate,[98] as where a grant is made to a man, or to a man and his assigns, without any limitation in point of time,[99] unless the grantor is only a tenant for life, in which case the grantee will take an estate for the life of the grantor.[1] It may also be created by a lease to the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns forever.[2] Where the grantor offers a life estate to a person and remainder to his heirs, the act of the life tenant in taking possession of the land is a sufficient acceptance of the offer to convey the life estate,[3] and the acceptance of the life tenant may be good as to the remaindermen.[4] An express life estate is not enlarged into a fee by being coupled with a power of conveyance or disposition,[5] or with a power to consume so much of the corpus of the estate as may be necessary for the support of the life tenant;[6] nor by a warranty in fee or covenant for quiet enjoyment to the grantee and his heirs,[7] or his children forever,[8] nor by its being doubtful who will ultimately receive the remainder.[9] The rule generally stated is that life estate in land cannot be created by a verbal agreement, but only by a valid deed or will;[10] but it has been held that a life interest may be transferred by an oral transfer, coupled with a taking of possession and the performance of other acts in reliance upon the grant.[11]

Property in which life estates may be created. While, as stated supra § 1, the term "estate" in its technical sense refers only to an interest in land, and as stated supra § 30 a life estate is a freehold interest in land, as shown infra § 133 a life estate may be created in personal property although the common law originally did not permit such an estate in such property.

§ 33. Incidents

The incidents pertaining to life estates include the right to estovers and emblements, liability for waste, and the like. The life estate is, in a proper case, alienable; and in general the life estate is liable for the debts of the life tenant.

In general. In the absence of special agreements or covenants to the contrary, the incidents pertaining to life estates are right to estovers, considered infra § 39, right to emblements, considered infra § 40, liability for waste, discussed infra § 43, liability to forfeiture, discussed infra § 65, and liability of the under tenant for rent, considered infra § 41.

Alienability. A life estate is alienable,[12] and, although it has been said that the power of alienation is not a necessary incident to a life estate in real property,[13] general restraints against the alienation of such an estate are void;[14] but it seems that the power of alienation may be restrained to a limited extent, as to certain designated persons;[15] and a provision in the instrument creating such an estate, that in the event of an attempted alienation it shall go over to some third person, is valid.[16]

Liability for debts of life tenant. A life estate is liable for the debts of the life tenant,[17] and this liability cannot be avoided by a provision against such liability in the instrument creating the estate,[18] unless accompanied by a limitation over, in the event of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the life tenant or such estate being taken for his debts.[19] Since, as stated infra § 65, on the death of the tenant for his own life his life estate terminates, land in which he had a life interest is not subject to a lien for his debts,[20] nor is the corpus of the estate chargeable with his debts[21] and funeral expenses.[22]

A life tenant cannot jeopardize the interests of the remaindermen by subjecting the assets of the estate to the uncertainties and risks of business ventures without their assent.[23]

§ 34. Relation of Life Tenant to Remainderman or Reversioner

The relation of a life tenant to a remainderman or reversioner is frequently termed that of a trustee or quasi trustee. The life tenant is a trustee in the sense that he cannot injure or dispose of the property to the

Lien for services
Where contract to pay nurse for services rendered to life tenant of realty out of proceeds of sale of realty was not claimed to have been entered into until after life tenant had conveyed the realty, reserving to herself only a life estate therein, the nurse by virtue of such contract could acquire no lien on the real estate enforceable as against title of grantee after life tenant's death. —Cunningham v. injury of the rights of the remainderman but he differs from a pure trustee in that he may use the property for his exclusive benefit and take all the income and profits.

While an ordinary tenant for life is not a trustee,[24] nor subject to trust remedies for those in remainder,[25] the relation of a life tenant to the remainderman or reversioner is frequently termed that of a trustee,[26] or a quasi trustee.[27] He is a trustee in the sense that he cannot injure or dispose of the property to the injury of the rights of the remainderman,[28] or, as stated infra § 35, acquire an outstanding title for his own exclusive benefit, and must use reasonable precautions to preserve the property intact without injury or diminution;[29] but he differs from the trustee of a pure trust in that he may use the property for his exclusive benefit and take all of the income and profits.[30] In general a life tenant can do nothing during the continuance of his estate to impair the estate in remainder,[31] and, on the other hand, the remainderman cannot do any act which will affect the life estate.[32] There is no tenure[33] nor any privity[34] of contract[35] between a life tenant and a remainderman; nor is there such a fiduciary relation as will prevent the life tenant from purchasing from the remainderman his remainder interest.[36] While the remainderman ultimately succeeds to the possession of the life tenant, he does not succeed to his title, but gets his title from another and independent source.[37] The relationship of the life tenant and the remainderman as debtor and creditor is discussed infra § 141.

A tenant for life and remaindermen are not tenants in common.[38]

Ordinarily a life tenant holds his estate rent free.[39]

§ 35. Acquisition of Outstanding Title or Claim

As a general rule, neither the life tenant nor one claiming under him can acquire an outstanding title or claim for his own exclusive use. If an outstanding title or claim is purchased by the life tenant the purchase will be regarded as having been made for the benefit of the life tenant and the remainderman or reversioner.

An outstanding title or interest cannot be acquired by the life tenant for his own exclusive benefit;[40] but one who refuses to accept a life estate, which it is attempted to bestow on him, may purchase and deal with premises like any other stranger.[41] A life tenant may be a purchaser at a sale to satisfy an encumbrance;[42] but neither a life tenant nor one claiming under him,[43] who allows the property to be sold for taxes[44] or the satisfaction of an encumbrance,[45] or the interest thereon,[46] can acquire a title adverse to the remainderman or reversioner by purchasing at the sale himself, or through an intermediary,[47] or by obtaining a conveyance of the title acquired by another purchaser at such sale.[48] Such a transaction amounts simply to a payment or redemption.[49] The disability which attaches to a tenant to assert title against his re-

Effect of collusion

One who entered into collusive agreement with life tenant to acquire tax title, in order to defeat the interests of the remaindermen, could not enforce a lien under the statute on the realty for the amount paid to acquire the title at the tax sale.—Turner v. Edwards, 292 N.W. 257, 207 Minn. 455.

Tax deed to life tenant's stepson and quitclaim deed without consideration from stepson to his mother, who was second wife of life tenant, would be set aside at suit of remaindermen without reimbursement or tender back of taxes or expenses of tax sale.—Westervelt v. Housner, 275 N.Y.S. 102, 153 Misc. 795.

Purchase by remainderman

As against other remaindermen, a remainderman, in possession under execution sale against life tenant, being chargeable with taxes as life tenant, was held not able to predicate adverse title on his own default by tax purchase.—Williams v. Williams, 202 N.W. 434, 200 Iowa 398, rehearing denied 204 N.W. 156.

Estoppel to invoke rule

mainderman also attaches to his wife;[50] but the wife of the life tenant may, if she acts in good faith, purchase the property at a foreclosure sale.[51] Where the will which created the life estate made it primarily liable for the payment of a bequest, the life tenant could not acquire the fee by purchasing title acquired under a decree based on his default in payment of the bequest.[52] Where a life tenant procured the issuance of a tax deed to himself, and then conveyed the land by a warranty deed, the possession taken thereunder was held to be adverse to the remainderman, since the warranty deed was color of title.[53] If the life tenant purchases an outstanding title or encumbrance, or purchases the property at a sale to satisfy an encumbrance, he cannot hold such title, encumbrance, or property for his exclusive benefit, but will be deemed to have made the purchase for the benefit of himself and the remainderman or reversioner,[54] in case the latter will contribute his share of the sum paid by the life tenant,[55] and does so within a reasonable time.[56] If the life tenant pays more than his proportionate share, he simply becomes a creditor of the estate for that amount.[57] Where a widow is in possession of land after her husband's death, and before the assignment of dower to her, she is entitled to purchase the property at a tax sale.[58]

§ 36. Present Value of Life Estate

While in some instances the present value of a life estate is considered as one third of the value of the whole, the general rule is to calculate the value according to the probable duration of the life estate based on the tables of life expectancy and considering the habits, state of health of the life tenant, and other circumstances of the particular case.

In determining the present value of a life estate, the English rule was to consider an estate for life as equal in value to one third of the whole,[59] and this rule has been adopted in some of the cases in this country.[60] The general rule, however, is to calculate the value according to probable duration of the life estate, based on the tables of life expectancy, but taking into consideration the habits, physical appearance, constitution, and state of health of the life tenant and the other circumstances of the particular case;[61] and it has been held that the opinions of witnesses familiar with the apparent physical condition of a life tenant are, in determining the value of the life estate, a safer guide than mortality tables.[62] In addition to life expectancy, the present worth of money, in connection with the risks attending loaning it, the payment of taxes and the like are to be considered.[63] After ascertaining the life expectancy it is a mistake to calculate the value of the life estate at compound interest.[64] It has been held that in contemplation of law an estate for life is equal to seven years' purchase of the fee and that, to estimate the present value of an estate for life, interest must be computed on the value of the whole property for seven years, interest on the several sums of the annual interest, from the present time to the periods at which they would respectively fall due, being perhaps abated.[65] The value

Offer of reimbursement unnecessary
Where life tenant or person in possession as trustee for remainderman purchased land at sale to enforce lien, purchase money being paid by former husband's estate and another who acted in behalf of trustee's daughter, it was unnecessary for remainderman to plead willingness to reimburse trustee as condition precedent to recovery of property.—Hager v. Connolly, supra.

Contribution held not required
Where a life tenant purposely permitted land to be sold under a deed of trust and bought the property in to avoid administration of the estate of deceased in Tennessee, and at the sale she paid an amount greater than the amount of the deed of trust, it was held that although ordinarily the remaindermen would be required to contribute the amount paid above the encumbrance, yet in this instance the court would not require them to contribute.—Miller v. of a life estate, subject to determination by an event happening prior to the death of the life tenant and dependent wholly on the volition of the latter, cannot be ascertained until the estate has terminated.[66] The present value of a life estate may be fixed by agreement between the life tenant and the remaindermen.[67] A statute providing for the determination of the value of a life estate does not empower a court to require the life tenant to take money instead of his estate except in the instances or under the circumstances provided for by statute.[68]

§ 37. Rights and Liabilities of Life Tenants

The rights and liabilities of a life tenant of real property are discussed in detail infra §§ 38-67. The rights and liabilities of life tenants of personal property are considered infra § 133 et seq. Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 38. Possession of Estate

As long as his estate therein continues, the life tenant is entitled to the possession and enjoyment of the real property.

As long as his estate therein continues, the life tenant of real property is entitled to its possession and enjoyment,[69] to the exclusion of the remainderman or reversioners[70] and those claiming through or under them,[71] unless the life tenant relinquishes or releases his right and permits such persons to take[72] or continue in[73] possession, and if the remainderman or reversioner obtains possession of the land before the determination of the life estate he will be required to restore the possession[74] and to account to the life tenant for all of the rents and profits received by him.[75] The life tenant's right of possession is not lost by sale of the property under deed of trust executed by the remainderman without the life tenant's knowledge, notwithstanding the remainderman had gone into possession with the life tenant's knowledge and had made improvements.[76] The life tenant is entitled to recover as damages the fair rental value of the property during the time it is unlawfully occupied, subject to any proper deductions.[77] A life tenant cannot be compelled to submit to a sale thereof or to accept a sum of money in lieu of the specific use of the property.[78] By will the management and control of the property may be placed in the executor.[79]

A life tenant is entitled as of common right to take reasonable estovers.

Every tenant for life is entitled of common right to take reasonable estovers, or botes, that is, wood from off the land for fuel, fences, agricultural erections, and other necessary improvements.[80] In taking wood for fuel he is entitled to take a reasonable quantity,[81] and to take good fuel and such as is conveniently situated.[82] The right includes a reasonable supply for servants living in the same or another house on the premises.[83] He may cut whatever timber is necessary for making repairs on the

§ 40. Emblements

As a general rule the life tenant, or one holding under him, has a right to emblements.

A tenant for life, or his legal representative, is entitled to emblements, that is, the crops planted by him prior to the termination of the life estate, in all cases where the life estate is terminated by the act of God, as by the death of the tenant,[86] and this rule applies notwithstanding the life tenant has and exercises a power of appointment by will to dispose of the fee.[87] The right ceases where the estate is terminated by the voluntary act of the tenant himself.[88] The right of emblements is not incident to a life estate created by a reservation in a deed in which the grantor divests himself of all existing and future rights in the property, except solely the right to retain the use and occupancy of the premises, and to take and receive the rents and profits during his lifetime.[89] A life tenant is not entitled to crops planted prior to the beginning of the life estate.[90] An undertenant or lessee of a tenant for life is entitled to crops planted by him prior to the death of the life tenant,[91] unless it is otherwise provided by statute;[92] and a tenant pur autre vie is entitled to crops planted by him prior to the death of the cestui que vie.[93] The husband of a life tenant is entitled to the crops planted by him prior to the death of the wife.[94] The right includes only such crops as are produced annually by the labor of the tenant,[95] and which are planted before the life estate determines,[96] and does not arise by reason merely of the preparation of the soil for planting.[97] The right to emblements carries with it a right of ingress and egress to preserve the crop and gather it and carry it away.[98]

§ 41. Income, Profits, and Accretions

a. In general
b. Rents

a. In General

In general a life tenant is entitled to everything in the nature of income or profits accruing during the continuance of the life estate.

In the absence of any limitation or restriction thereof,[99] everything in the nature of income or profits accruing during the continuance of the life estate belongs to the life tenant,[1] and at his death, if not otherwise disposed of by him, passes to his representative;[2] but any appreciation in the principal of the estate belongs to the remainderman[3] unless it is otherwise provided by the grantor.[4] The capital of the estate cannot be broken into for the benefit of the remainderman so as to diminish the income of the life tenant without the latter's consent.[5] A sum forfeited to a testator's estate on nonperformance of a real estate contract should be treated as capital and credited as an addition of the principal of the estate, and not as income to which the life tenant would be entitled.[6]

b. Rents

A life tenant is entitled to rents accruing from the property during the continuance of his estate. In general, where a life tenant leases the property, and dies during the term of the lease, the rents may be apportioned between the life tenant's estate and the remaindermen.

The life tenant is entitled to all the rents accruing from the property during the continuance of his estate,[7] and to collect them himself without interference by the executor or remainderman.[8] On the other hand, the life tenant is not entitled to the rent for the premises after the determination of the life estate.[9] While the life tenant, in the absence of

Property purchased with profits

(1) Land purchased with the profits from the life estate has been held to belong exclusively to the life tenant.—Gibony v. Hutcheson, 50 S.W. 648, 20 Tex.Civ.App. 581.

(2) However, it has been held that, where a will gives property to the widow for use during life, with remainder to the children, she has only a life estate in property purchased by her with the rents and profits of the devised property.—Esman v. Esman, 18 Ohio Cir.Ct. 603, 10 Ohio Cir.Dec. 257.

Moneys held not income

A life tenant is not entitled to unexpended proceeds of note executed by commissioner to borrow money to pay expenses of foreclosure sale and delinquent taxes on land acquired by foreclosure of mortgage owned by life tenant and remaindermen, but sum should be applied to reduce principal of note.—Livesay v. Boyd, 180 S.E. 158, 164 Va. 528.

Estates pur autre vie

On death of one holding estate pur autre vie, income held payable to his representatives until death of cestui que vie.—Morgan v. Williams, 66 How.Pr., N.Y., 139.

Estate limited to support and maintenance

Where will vests unconditional life estate with provision for remainder at death of life tenant, life tenant is entitled to all income from estate during life tenancy, and unexpended income at her death constitutes a part of her estate and does not pass to remaindermen under the will, but this rule does not apply where enjoyment of estate for life is specifically limited to necessary support and maintenance; and under will giving wife use of property for lifetime for her support and maintenance, if it became necessary for her to sell any part of the property or to exchange it for other property, or convert it into money to be loaned out or otherwise reinvested, she could only use such part of the income derived therefrom as was necessary and proper for her support and maintenance and at her death all that remainded would pass to the remaindermen.—Hair v. Farrell, 103 S.W.2d 918, 21 Tenn.App. 12.

Recovery from remainderman

After payment of note secured by deed of trust

Necessity for termination

Remaindermen, claiming a violation of a condition subsequent by the life tenant in subleasing the premises, have no right to rents collected by the life tenant where they took no steps to terminate the life estate for the alleged breach, and, having knowledge that the life tenant was subleasing the premises, may be estopped from asserting any right to the rents.—Union Trust Co. v. a valid conveyance of the rents and profits, is ordinarily entitled to recover them from the remainderman when both live together on the land,[10] this has been held not to apply between parents and child when they are living thereon, with the latter's family, for a long term of years, the child taking full charge and management of the lands and supporting them all therefrom.[11] A remainderman who leases a life tenant's interest for a stipulated annual rental is liable for the just proportion of the annual rent for the year in which the life tenant died.[12] Rents due to a life tenant at his death are collectable by his personal representative,[13] but where the life tenant takes his estate subject to an existing lease, and dies during the term of the lessee, before any rent becomes due, his personal representative cannot recover any part thereof, but the rent for the entire term becomes an incident to the reversion.[14] At common law there could be no apportionment of rent as to time where the tenant for life leased and died during the period for which rent was payable;[15] and the lessee was not bound to pay at all for so much of the time since the last rent day as had elapsed before the death of the tenant for life;[16] but it has been held that, where he conscientiously paid for the whole time, the person who took the estate in remainder could not recover from the executor or administrator of the life tenant, any of the rent so paid.[17] In England this was remedied by statute.[18] In this country the general rule allows an apportionment;[19] but in some jurisdictions the rule remains the same as at common law,[20] except that, if the lessee continues to occupy the premises after his lease has been determined by the death of the life tenant, the remainderman may recover the reasonable value of such use and occupation.[21]

§ 42. Working Mines, Quarries, Oil or Gas Wells

A life tenant cannot, as a general rule, open new mines or quarries or oil or gas wells, or authorize another to do so; but this may be done by agreement with the remaindermen. Mines, quarries, or oil or gas wells already opened may be worked by the life tenant, or he may authorize another to do so, and the life tenant is entitled to all proceeds resulting from such operation.

Although a life tenant may be authorized to open mines or drill wells after the inception of his estate,[22] and may be authorized to execute leases for such purpose,[23] as a general rule a life tenant who is impeachable for waste cannot open new mines or quarries or oil or gas wells,[24] or lease the land to others for this purpose,[25] and remaindermen in title may not make such a lease to permit immediate

Effect of lease

Under Illinois law, life tenant could not grant lease for removal of oil from premises, nor could remainderman as against life tenant give lessee right to enter and remove oil, but an oil lease executed by life tenant conveyed a freehold and entitled assignee of lease to go upon the land, operate for oil and gas, lay pipe lines, and to build tanks to take care of oil from the premises, without interference by remaindermen, and the assignee was seized of a valid property interest which neither remaindermen, his lessee, or life tenant could, without assignee's consent, defeat, and right could not be defeated by life tenant by quitclaim deed delivered to lessee of remaindermen.—Carter Oil Co. v. McQuigg, D.C.Ill., 27 F.Supp. 182, affirmed, C.C.A., 112 F.2d 275.

Lease illegal

Life tenant of undeveloped coal land could not recover on lease of land for purpose of opening mines, such lease being illegal, and a provision in life tenant's illegal lease of undeveloped coal land for mining purposes, regarding payment of switch rental, is not enforceable as valid severable undertaking especially where injustice would result to lessee from its separate enforcement.—Miller v. Bowen Coal & Mining Co., Mo.App., 40 S.W.2d 485.

Joinder by guardian of remainderman

Mineral leases executed by life tenant without authority became lawful as to remainderman after his joinder therein by guardian pursuant to court order, and case stood as though remainderman had sunk the wells and life tenant was claiming participation.—Texas Co. v. Marlin, C.C.A.Tex., 109 F.2d 305, reversing, D.C., Marlin v. Texas Co., 26 F. Supp. 611.

Separate approval

Where remaindermen by separate document approved original oil and gas lease executed by life tenant to all intents and purposes as though they had executed original lease, effect was as though they had joined in lease in first instance, as regards right to royalty.—Burden v. Gypsy Oil Co., 40 P.2d 463, 141 Kan. 147.

Owners of undivided interest and life estate

Sons to whom parents conveyed an undivided one-fourth interest in land and a life interest in the remaining undivided three-fourths interest in the land were entitled to one fourth of royalties under oil and gas lease and to the income accruing from three fourths of the royalties under the oil and gas lease, and the corpus of such three fourths of the royalties was required to be preserved for the remainderman.—Mills v. Mills, 121 S.W.2d 962, 275 Ky. 431.

Liability of lessee to life tenant and remainderman

Where fee in minerals was in remainderman, life tenant was entitled to interest that could be earned on royalty payments during her life and lessee was not liable to remainderman for any interest during that time, but owed him interest on payments only from time of life tenant's death; and, where mineral leases executed by life tenant without authority were subsequently adopted by guardian for minor remainderman, pursuant to court order, remainderman was entitled to recover royalties for oil produced subsequent to adoption of the lease, but without interest during continuance of the life estate, and with interest at the legal rate thereafter, rather than at rate of ten per cent. on theory that lessee was a delinquent "trustee."—Texas Co. v. Assignee of oil lease, executed by life tenant, is bound by covenant to pay lessor stated royalty, but the life tenant, executing oil lease, requiring payment to him of one sixth of one eighth of oil, after remaindermen executed lease reserving one-eighth royalty, is not entitled to have proceeds of sale of one eighth of oil impounded and interest paid him during his life.—Orndoff v. his right to royalties ceases on his death.[36] A bonus for a lease, which was a part of the consideration for the entire title to minerals, belongs to the remaindermen subject to the estate of the life tenant.[37] When not expressly precluded, however,[38] a life tenant may work a mine, quarry, or well, opened before the creation of his estate,[39] even to exhaustion;[40] and not only for his own use but for profit;[41] and is entitled to all proceeds derived from such operation[42] without being obliged to make provision for any fund to offset depletion.[43] Mining by the life tenant will be allowed if the former owner of the fee has impressed on it the character of mining land, by executing an enforceable lease for that purpose prior to the commencement of the life estate, although no mines have been opened thereunder until after the commencement of the life estate;[44] and if a lessee of an oil and gas lease enters after lessor's death and drills and produces oil and gas, the wells will be regarded as open at lessor's death, and the life tenant will be entitled to the rents and profits reserved to lessor, accruing therefrom, during the life tenancy.[45] If necessary the life tenant may sink new shafts and open new pits on veins of minerals already opened;[46] and he may pursue the veins opened to the limits of the tract but not into another distinct tract on which no opening was made.[47] In the case of mines in which work was discontinued prior to the creation of the life estate, a mere cessation of work for however long will not defeat the right of the life tenant to continue it,[48] but if the mine has been abandoned with an executed intention of devoting the land to some other use[49] the work cannot be continued by the life tenant. A life tenant who recognizes that production of oil from adjacent territory may diminish reserves which normally would come into the possession of the remainderman may execute leases in order to conserve the contingent estate.[50] Where the grantor in a deed reserves to himself and his wife life estates and mining rights, a mining company purchasing such rights from the wife after the death of the grantor and exercising them is not accountable to the remainderman.[51]

a. In General

In general, a life tenant has no right to commit waste; that is, to do any act which does a permanent injury to the inheritance.

With the exception of tenants in tail after possibility of issue extinct, considered supra § 28, the tenants of legal life estates are impeachable for waste.[52] It has been said that originally tenants of conventional life estates were not impeachable for waste, unless expressly made so by the instrument

Right of widow in homestead
Life tenants by virtue of operation of law, such as a widow, in the case of a homestead, cannot use the property for any purpose which would work an injury to the inheritance, except those purposes to which it had been devoted at the time the life estate came into existence.—Petrus v. creating the estate,[53] but the general rule is now that a life tenant has no right to commit waste,[54] either voluntary or permissive, according to the authorities in this country,[55] or to authorize another to commit waste,[56] and one holding under the life tenant may be held liable for waste.[57] The general rule that the life tenant is liable for waste committed by a stranger as well as for that committed by himself,[58] does not apply in the case of an injury caused by the negligent act of a stranger,[59] or of a destructive trespass of a stranger, which the life tenant neither licenses nor negligently suffers to be done,[60] nor where a mere incorporeal hereditament is transferred to the life tenant.[61] A stranger who commits waste is liable over to the life tenant for damages which the latter has been compelled to pay to the owner of the reversion.[62] Where, under existing statutes, only the tenant for life can be held responsible for waste, a life tenant who has assigned his entire interest and surrendered possession cannot be held liable for waste suffered subsequent to the surrender, he being no longer the life tenant.[63] No precise rule can be laid down that will apply in all cases as to what specific acts will constitute waste,[64] but in general any act which does a permanent injury to the inheritance is waste.[65] What is a permanent injury to the inheritance must often depend on the facts and circumstances of the particular case under consideration.[66] The life tenant may do whatever is required for the general use and enjoyment of the estate as received,[67] but he does not have the right to exercise acts of dominion or ownership over it;[68] and with reference to waste it has been said that the law intends that the life tenant shall enjoy his estate in such reasonable way, as that the land shall pass to the reversioner, as nearly as practicable, unimpaired as to its natural capacities and the improvements on it.[69] However, the fact that the inheritance is as valuable at the termination of the life estate as at its beginning[70] or that the life tenant has improved the estate[71] is no justification for acts of waste committed by the life tenant. The court is not concerned with the motives and purposes of the life tenant in determining whether his acts would constitute waste.[72] Owing to the difference in conditions, the common-law doctrine of waste has been greatly modified in this country, and many things may be done by a tenant for life here that in England would be waste.[73] Thus in England it is waste for a life tenant to convert arable land into meadow or pasture land or vice versa,[74] but in this country the rule is otherwise,[75] unless the change is detrimental to the inheritance and contrary to the ordinary course of good husbandry,[76] and it is not waste to permit arable or pasture land to grow up in timber.[77] In this country the general rule has come to be that a life tenant may do whatever is required for the proper enjoyment of his estate, to the extent that his acts and management are sanctioned by good husbandry in the locality where the land is situated, having regard, also, to its condition, if he does not cause a substantial injury to the inheritance.[78] A life estate may be created "without impeachment of waste,"[79] in which case the tenant may do all reasonable acts consistent with the preservation of the estate which otherwise might in law be waste;[80] but he cannot commit malicious or, as it is called, equitable, waste so as to destroy the estate,[81] and can do no act to affect the inheritance in an unreasonable and unconscientious manner.[82]

b. Cutting, Selling, and Removal of Timber

In a proper case the life tenant may have the right of cutting, selling, or removing timber from the land, and whether in a particular instance such actions constitute waste depends on the circumstances of the particular case. In the absence of authorization by the creator of the life estate, the life tenant may cut, sell, or remove timber only when his acts are conformable to the rules of good husbandry and the inheritance is not damaged or diminished.

The common-law doctrine of waste has been modified in this country most particularly with regard to the cutting and removal of timber,[83] which in many cases would benefit rather than injure the inheritance,[84] but which must be decided as a question of fact on the particular circumstances of each case.[85] The life tenant may in this country usually remove timber so as to fit the land for pasture or cultivation, the rule being that such clearing is not waste if it does not damage or diminish the value of the inheritance and the acts of the tenant are conformable to the rules of good husbandry;[86] and in such cases the timber removed, it has been held, may be sold by the tenant or used off the premises.[87] The amount of clearing which may be done depends on the circumstances of the particular case;[88] and if it is in fact an injury to the inheritance,[89] or the real purpose is the sale of the timber,[90] its removal is waste. It is not waste to cut dead or decaying trees.[91] Unless the life tenant is authorized to do so by the creator in the instrument creating the life estate,[92] it is waste to sell or cut for sale either timber trees[93] or firewood,[94] or to exchange or sell timber for fuel,[95] or for materials for repairs,[96] or in making repairs to cut a greater amount of timber than is necessary,[97] and the life tenant is liable in tort to the remainderman.[98] It has been held, however, that the general rule that trees cut and sold are treated as principal and not as income and that a life tenant is guilty of waste in cutting trees for sale is not applicable to trees on wild land kept and held merely for the produce of salable timber,[99] and that where before the commencement of the life estate the land had been cultivated for the produce of salable timber, the life tenant may continue the cultivation for his own profit.[1] An exception to the rule against selling or exchanging timber to obtain funds or materials for repairs has been made when repairs are necessary and the means of making them cannot be otherwise obtained,[2] or where it appears that the sale of the timber and the purchase of materials with the proceeds is the most economical means of making the repairs;[3] but to justify this exception the sale of the timber must be made with the present view of making repairs, the proceeds must be honestly expended, and there must be no substantial injury to the inheritance.[4] It has been held that in an action for an accounting for a wrongful cutting of trees, the life tenant is not entitled to any allowance on account of the fact that he has procured firewood from other sources instead of cutting it from the estate,[5] but there is authority to the contrary.[6] The purchaser of timber with notice of the nature of the title is liable to the remainderman for the value thereof, as of the date and place of conversion.[7] Timber trees, except such as the life tenant is authorized to cut, it has been held, become the property of the remainderman or reversioner, whether cut by the life tenant,[8] or a third person,[9] or blown down on the land by storms;[10] and he may maintain replevin for their recovery,[11] or trespass for taking them away and converting them.[12] It has been held, however, that while the life tenant has no right to cut and sell timber, he nevertheless has the right to have it remain on the premises, and when it has been severed without his fault, he is entitled to an estate for life in the proceeds and to have the proceeds invested and the interest paid to him,[13] and that, although one entitled to the use of the whole estate both real and personal for life has no right to sell timber without the consent of the remainderman, yet having done so he is entitled to the use of the fund arising from the sale of the timber during his life;[14] but there is authority to the contrary.[15] The right to reduce land to cultivation by cutting and removing timber does not warrant the life tenant's retaining all of the proceeds from the sale of the timber.[16]

c. Removal or Destruction of Buildings

In general the removal or destruction of buildings on the premises by the life tenant is waste.

For a life tenant to tear down a house on the premises is waste,[17] even though the house is not tenantable,[18] or the object in removing it is to erect a better building in its place.[19] A building not affixed to the freehold may be removed by the life tenant,[20] but the removal of any building intended as a permanent part of the freehold is waste;[21] and this is true even where the tenant for life is "without impeachment of waste."[22] A life tenant may, however, remove an outbuilding which is in such a dilapidated condition as to be dangerous to stock, unless its condition resulted from his neglect.[23] Where life estates in adjoining parcels of property are devised separately, and are not in common own-

Life estate in residence
Life tenant, devised testator's residence, could use dwelling reasonably for own convenience or profit, but demolition of such dwelling and erection of apartment would be exercise of act of ownership by life tenant, since this would prevent delivery of inheritance to remaindermen, and the life tenant, although tendering bond, could not against will of remaindermen demolish such dwelling for purpose of erecting apartment, although maintenance was unprofitable as investment.—Brokaw v. Fairchild, 237 N.Y.S. 6, 135 Misc. 70, affirmed 245 N.Y.S. 402, 231 App.Div. 704, affirmed 177 N.E. 186, 256 N.Y. 670.

ership, the properties have no plottage value so that alleged impairment of such value could not prevent removal of a building by one of the life tenants.[24] Where destruction of a building results from an act of God and the life tenant salvages and sells materials from it, he is required to apply the money realized for the benefit of the remaindermen.[25] Where a life tenant tears down a building, a third person who purchases the materials is liable to the remainderman for the value thereof, since the life tenant had no right to sell and the buyer obtains no title.[26]

A life tenant must make all the ordinary repairs necessary to preserve the property and prevent its going to waste, but he need not make extraordinary repairs.

A tenant for life must make all the ordinary repairs necessary to preserve the property and prevent its going to waste,[27] to the extent at least of its rental value,[28] unless there is a provision to the contrary in the instrument creating the estate.[29] He is bound to keep the premises in as good repair as they were when he took them,[30] not excepting ordinary or natural wear and tear,[31] and this duty devolves on one holding under the life tenant.[32] Where, however, a life estate is created in premises occupied by a tenant under a lease for years, which does not expressly charge the landlord with the duty of repairs, the measure of the life tenant's liability for repairs is, at most, the cost of restoring the premises to the condition in which they were when the lease expired, as distinguished from the cost of restoring them to the condition in which they were at time of creation;[33] but he is not bound to

For repairs to be chargeable against corpus of estate instead of income, directions in will to such effect must be unequivocal; but where testatrix devised to husband life estate in dwelling with remainder over to nephews, and provided repairs should be chargeable against her estate, life tenant is entitled to have such charges paid out of corpus rather than income.—In re Mills' Estate, 266 N.Y.S. 478, 148 Misc. 224.

make extraordinary repairs,[34] which involve the substitution of new structures for old or parts thereof for old,[35] or to repair buildings which are in an untenantable condition at the time the life estate is created.[36] If the cost of repairs would exceed the value of the buildings, he is not bound to repair them but may leave them to their natural destruction.[37] A life tenant is not bound to restore a building destroyed by the act of God,[38] or by an accidental fire for which he was not to blame.[39] A failure to make necessary repairs is waste.[40] If repairs are necessary to preserve the estate, and the life tenant after due notice and request does not make them within a reasonable time,[41] the remainderman may, by appropriate proceedings, require him to make such repairs[42] or may have them made[43] and may recover the cost of such repairs from the life tenant,[44] or, as stated infra § 64, a receiver may be appointed to apply the rents and income to this purpose. Remaindermen cannot recover the cost of repairs made after the termination of the life tenancy which were not, in the usual course of such matters, necessitated during the occupancy of the life tenant.[45] In ascertaining the amount, if any, chargeable against the estate of a life tenant for repairs necessitated by marauders, the court should ascertain whether or not the acts of depredation were due to negligence of the life tenant.[46] Where the necessary repairs are also in the nature of permanent improvements which are of benefit to both the life tenant and the remainderman, and increase the value of the latter's estate as compared with its value at the time the life estate was created, the expense of such repairs may be apportioned according to the respective interests.[47] A life tenant of certain rooms in a house and the reversioner who occupies the rest of the house are in contemplation of law occupants of distinct dwellings, and neither can recover from the other on account of repairs made without request.[48] If the life estate is in the hands of a trustee, he may apply the rents and profits to making necessary repairs, but in the absence of a power of sale cannot sell any part of the property for this purpose.[49]

§ 45. Improvements

In general, if the life tenant makes permanent improvements on the property it is presumed that they were for his own benefit, and he cannot recover anything therefor from the remainderman or reversioner. Under certain circumstances the cost of improvements may be apportioned; and in some jurisdictions in a proper case the life tenant may be entitled to reimbursement.

A tenant for life is not bound to make any permanent improvements on the estate;[50] and when such improvements are made by an executor or trustee they are not chargeable against the life tenant except when made by his procurement,[51] although in some cases where the improvement was a distinct benefit to both interests it has been held that the cost should be apportioned.[52] The rule, as generally stated, is, that if the life tenant himself makes permanent improvements it will be presumed that they were for his own benefit, and he cannot recover anything therefor from the remainderman or reversioner,[53] especially, where knowing that his interest is limited to a life estate, he makes improvements for the comfort and convenience of himself and family.[54] The life tenant does not acquire a lien enforceable against the remainderman.[55] This rule applies to one holding under a life tenant,[56] and one lending him money for making improvements cannot charge the remainderman.[57] This rule, however, is not absolutely without exception,[58] as in the case of a life tenant who completes improvements begun by the donor,[59] and it has been somewhat relaxed by some of the later decisions,[60] it being held that where improvements of a permanent character have been made to the estate, by compulsion,[61] as in the case of municipal improvements to be paid for by taxation,[62] or where buildings become untenantable without neglect on the part of the life tenant,[63] or where improvements are necessary by reason of changed conditions,[64] or in order to obtain a reasonable return from property which is unproductive,[65] and the expenditure for such improvements is for the best interests of the remaindermen, as well as the life tenant,[66] and does not contravene the terms of the instrument creating the life estate and the estate in remainder,[67] the cost of such improvements should be paid out of the corpus of the estate,[68] or apportioned between the life tenant and the remaindermen according to the benefit accruing to each.[69]

Improvements by executor who was life tenant

Where building destroyed by fire, in which estate had one half undivided interest, was rebuilt by executor, who was life beneficiary, and who, when land was subsequently appropriated by state, purchased building for small amount and moved it to another site, in which estate owned one half interest, and made alterations and improvements thereto, executor was entitled to charge estate for its share of expenses on his accounting, but charges against the remainderman should be limited to value of improvements at the time remainderman would, in ordinary course of events, finally come into enjoyment of them, by deducting proper allowance for depreciation, and the executor, who was also life tenant, was not entitled to credit on his accounting for expenditures which were not permanent improvements.—In re Schummers' Will, 206 N.Y.S. 113, 210 App.

According to some authorities the cost of permanent improvements should usually be borne by the remainderman,[70] especially where there are circumstances making this course equitable,[71] it being within the power of the court to apportion the expenses of improvements between the life tenant and the remainderman whenever it appears equitable to do so.[72] According to others the cost of permanent improvements,[73] which add to the value of both the life estate and remainder, should be equitably apportioned between the life tenant and the remainderman, taking into account the probable duration of the life estate and other relevant facts,[74] the life tenant paying the interest and the remainderman the principal,[75] and it has been held that in a proper case the cost of improvements, irrespective of whether they should be classed as permanent or as repairs, will be apportioned between the life tenant and the remainderman.[76] It has been held that a life tenant[77] or one claiming under him[78] cannot charge the remainder estate[79] or remainderman personally[80] with improvements on the land, although he makes them in good faith under the belief that he is the absolute owner; but there is authority to the contrary,[81] and it is sometimes otherwise provided by statute.[82] The life tenant's personal representative cannot recover from the remainderman the value of improvements, placed on land by lessees of the life tenant, at their own expense, and to the cost of which the life tenant did not contribute.[83] Where the life tenant is an infant and the income of the property is invested by order of the court in permanent improvements, the value of the improvements may be apportioned between the life tenant and the remainderman.[84] Where a tenant for life is also a tenant in common of the remainder he will be allowed, on partition with his cotenants, compensation for improvements made during the continuance of the life estate.[85] The liability of the life tenant and the remainderman for the cost of improvements may depend on an agreement made by them.[86] In the case of a sale under order of court of property on which the life tenant has made permanent improvements for the mutual accommodation of himself and the remainderman, he will be allowed to recover the value of such

On ejectment of life tenant

One making improvements on land believing himself to be owner in fee is entitled, when dispossessed in ejectment, to recover compensation, under Rev.St.1919, § 1834, for improvements put on such land, although only life tenant.—Staub v. Phillips, 271 S.W. 365, 307 Mo. 576.

Agreement by some of remaindermen

Notwithstanding the evidence sustained finding that a written agreement to pay for improvements during life tenancy was executed and delivered by three of four remaindermen, such agreement created merely a personal obligation on those who executed it, and did not create lien on property, and was no defense to an action in ejectment.—Day v. Day, 230 N.W. 634, 180 Minn. 151.

improvements out of the proceeds of the sale.[87] Under a warranty deed signed by the life tenant and the heirs in the remainder, all improvements by the life tenant go with the property conveyed.[88] Improvements made by the life tenant become part of the real estate and pass to the remainderman, and they may not be removed without the consent of the remaindermen.[89]

§ 46. Insurance

As a general rule, the life tenant is not bound to keep the premises insured for the benefit of the remainderman or reversioner.

It has been stated, as a general rule, that the life tenant is not bound to keep the premises insured for the benefit of the remainderman or reversioner,[90] unless there is an agreement that he shall do so,[91] or a provision to that effect in the instrument creating the estate;[92] but that either may insure for his own benefit,[93] the tenant for life and the remainderman paying insurance for their respective interests.[94] Ordinarily this is what is done,[95] and it has been held that neither the life tenant nor the remainderman will be benefited by the other's policy.[96] On the other hand, it has frequently been held that insurance is chargeable to the life tenant.[97] Thus, where the estate is subject to a mortgage executed by the donor of the life estate and containing a covenant that the buildings on the estate shall be kept insured, the premiums must be paid by the life tenant;[98] and it has been said that the true rule is that if the insurance benefits the life tenant solely, then he must pay the premium, if the remainderman only is benefited then he must pay it, if both the tenant and the remainderman are benefited it must be apportioned between them.[99]

§ 47. Taxes and Assessments

As a general rule, the life tenant in possession is required to pay all ordinary taxes on the property during the continuance of his estate. Assessments for public improvements not being ordinary taxes, the life tenant may or may not be obliged to pay, and it is generally held that if the improvements are permanent, the assessment should be apportioned between the tenant for life and the remainderman.

Duty of life tenant to remainderman to pay ordinary taxes does not spring from privity of estate or by covenant, but it is an incident, of equitable origin, to the life estate.—In re Hone's Estate, 274 N.Y.S. 101, 152 Misc. 221.

Estate of life tenant

(1) Estate of deceased life beneficiary of testamentary trust in realty, occupied by her, instead of receiving net income therefrom, is liable to executor and trustee for taxes and fire insurance premium not paid by her, but a residuary devisee, living with life beneficiary of testamentary trust in house occupied by latter until her death, is not liable for taxes and fire insurance premium not paid by beneficiary.—In re Newton's Estate, 266 N.Y.S. 653, 148 Misc. 510.

(2) Estate of widow, life tenant, is not entitled to reimbursement from proceeds of sale for taxes paid by widow.—Spring v. Hollander, 158 N.E 791, 261 Mass. 373.

Payment of tax lien

Expenditures by life tenant in paying off liens against property for taxes, street improvements, and making permanent improvements on property, are not properly chargeable against the remainder interests. —Hamilton v. Kinnebrew, 131 S.E. 470, 161 Ga. 495.

Successive homestead rights

As a life tenant must pay ordinary annual taxes accruing during term a child with homestead right in land of deceased father was not liable for taxes accruing during continuance of mother's homestead life estate.—Schowe v. Kallmeyer, 20 S. W.2d 26, 323 Mo. 899.

Surviving wife of testator, entitled to life estate in testator's realty, to the extent of her dower interest, is liable for proportionate share of taxes.—In re Hale's Estate, 18 P.2d 803, 142 Or. 23.

Life tenant's lessee, who, having purchased property at tax sale, received rents and profits, is not entitled, as against redeeming remainderman, to retain rents, and at the same time recover the amount paid in taxes.—Wells v. Henry, 45 S.W 2d 20, 184 Ark. 1114.

Purchasers of property sold for taxes due by life tenant in possession of the realty had duty to list the property and pay the taxes after the date of the purchase, and were not entitled to receive from the remainderman the amount of taxes paid by the tax purchasers.—Vaughn v. Metcalf, 118 S.W.2d 727, 274 Ky 379.

Purchaser of tax lien and life interest

A tax lien covers entire premises, and is not impaired by coming into hands of one who subsequently secured life interest and part of remainder interest in property, there being an intent that these interests should not merge.—Peerless Candy Co. v. Kessler, 205 N.Y.S. 883, 123 Misc. 735.

Agreement of remainderman

Paying taxes is not required of life tenants becoming such by reservation in deed in which grantee, as remainderman, agrees to support them.—In re Ringle's Estate, 242 N. W. 908, 259 Mich. 262.

ment creating the estate relieving him of this liability;[5] and, as stated infra § 64, in the case of failure of the life tenant to do so, a receiver may be appointed to collect the rents and income and apply them to this purpose, or the remainderman may by appropriate action require him to pay,[6] or may himself pay, the taxes and recover the amount from the life tenant,[7] and a lien may be declared on the interest of the life tenant in favor of the remainderman for the amount which the latter has had to pay.[8] It has been held that taxes do not constitute a lien on the fee where possession is in a life tenant;[9] but taxes on any part of the property devised to a life tenant constitute a lien on all his taxable property.[10] The life estate as such is not taxed but the land is taxed and the payment of the tax is left for the determination of the life tenant and the owner of the fee.[11] Taxes assessed before the testator's death, and which have become a liability against him, should be paid by his executor, and cannot be charged against the life tenant.[12] A life tenant during his tenancy being for all practical purposes the owner of the property, the rule that taxes due at the time of the owner's death must be paid out of his personal estate applies.[13] It has been decided that taxes which have become a lien on the land before the life tenant's death must be paid by his representative, although not payable until after such death;[14] but, on the other hand, it has been held that on the death of the life tenant taxes for the current year should be apportioned between him and the remainderman according to the respective periods of their enjoyment,[15] and that, if paid in advance by the life tenant, his estate may recover the amount due from such apportionment.[16] The life tenant has been held not liable for taxes assessed during his lifetime but not due and payable until after his death.[17] Where the life tenant dies before the day on which the taxes are assessed, there should be no apportionment of the taxes between the estate of the life tenant and the remaindermen, but the latter are required to bear the entire burden of the taxes.[18] To relieve real estate from the lien for taxes a remainderman will have to pay taxes assessed before the life tenant's death and unpaid by him.[19] A tax sale of a life tenant's estate does not affect the rights of the remainderman.[20] A remainderman voluntarily paying taxes cannot recover them from the representative of the life tenant.[21]

Remedies available

Where obligation to pay taxes or assessments devolves on owner of life estate either by instrument creating the estate or by operation of law and owner fails to do so, the remainderman's remedies are to bring action for damages or for mandatory injunction against the life tenant; or for the appointment of receiver to manage and operate the land and perform the duty; or to impress life estate with lien where remainderman has made payment of item which it was duty of life tenant to pay; or to compel the life tenant or his personal representatives to reimburse remainderman for sums expended for taxes and assessments.—Dormer v. Set-off

Remaindermen have the right to off-set, against life tenant's judgment debt against them which has been declared a lien on the reversion, the amount of tax encumbrance imposed on the property because of life tenant's failure to pay taxes.—Meadows v. Meadows, 5 S.E.2d 128, 216 N.C. 413.

Purchase at tax sale

Alleged remainderman, who purchased land at delinquent tax sale, is entitled to recover taxes paid out of escrow deposit of purchaser of life estate covering possible liability of the life estate for the taxes, and the life estate is liable for the taxes, notwithstanding the money to pay the delinquent taxes was furnished by all, instead of one, of remaindermen.—Youngblood v. 21. Mont.—Anderson v. McClenathen, 205 P. 230, 62 Mont. 387.

Unproductive realty. Where taxes are assessed against unproductive real estate, it has been held that they are not chargeable to the life tenant,[22] but there is authority to the contrary,[23] and it has also been held that, where the trust estate to whose income the life tenant is entitled consists in part of unimproved property producing no revenue, the life tenant is bound to pay the taxes on the unimproved property from the income derived by him from the revenue producing property, so far as such income extends.[24] Taxes paid by a life tenant, which should have been paid by the remainderman, may be recovered back from the latter.[25]

Limit of liability. The liability as a rule is limited to the income or rental value of the property,[26] but all of the rents and profits accruing during the continuance of the life estate are applicable to the discharge of the liability.[27]

Waste. To neglect his duty to pay taxes,[28] and to allow the estate to be sold for taxes is waste,[29] and the life tenant is liable to the remainderman for the injury sustained by him,[30] except in cases where the income or rental value of the property was insufficient to pay the taxes,[31] and it is for the remainderman to show that the income from the property was sufficient for this purpose.[32]

Illegal tax. If the life tenant deems the taxes illegal, notice of that should be given to the reversioner, and the latter indemnified against loss, if payment of the taxes is to be resisted.[33]

An assessment for a public improvement is not an ordinary tax,[34] and the question whether it must be borne by the life tenant or by the remainderman, or apportioned between the two, depends to a large extent on the circumstances of the particular case, and especially on the probable duration of the improvement as compared with the expectancy of life of the life tenant.[35] If the assessment is for something in the nature of a permanent improvement of the whole estate, it may be ratably and equitably divided between the tenant for life and the remainderman.[36] However, when improvement assessments are distributed over a period of years, a ratable and equitable distribution of the burden of paying the debt requires that the life tenant discharge the annual assessments during each year of his occupancy.[37] Where the improvement is of a temporary character, calculated to benefit only the life interest, the assessment must be paid entirely by the life tenant.[38] Where a part of the improvement is permanent and a part will have to be replaced within a short time, the life tenant is properly charged with the cost of that part of the improvement which is temporary and the remainderman with the balance.[39] According to some authorities assessments for improvements of a permanent nature ought to be apportioned between the life tenant and remainderman in the proportion which the value of the life estate bears to the value of the whole estate,[40] while according to others, the principal of the expenditure for an assessment should be paid by the remainderman, and the life tenant should, during his term of enjoyment, pay the interest on such expenditure.[41] The recourse of a life tenant who pays the whole assessment is by way of equitable contribution or subrogation, and he is not entitled to a personal judgment against the remainderman.[42] Where the assessment is one which is to be borne ratably by the life tenant and the remainderman, the life tenant and the remainderman are entitled to share ratably in a refund for excessive assessments after the sale of the land for the taxes.[43]

§ 48. Debts, Charges, and Encumbrances

A life tenant of property subject to encumbrances must keep down the interest thereon accruing during the continuance of his estate. He is under no obligation to pay off the principal, and if he does so is entitled to contribution.

A life tenant of property subject to encumbrances must keep down the interest accruing on such encumbrances during the continuance of his estate,[44] at least to the extent of the income or rental value of the property,[45] unless other provision is made for its payment by grantor;[46] but this rule does not apply where there is a general charge of all the testator's debts on his real estate, in the event that the personal estate proves insufficient to pay them.[47] One who conveys land by deed, reserving to himself a life estate, is under no obligation to pay the interest of a mortgage placed on the land by grantee and not joined in by the life tenant;[48] and in case of a deed subject to an encumbrance and reserving a life estate, the grantor is not personally bound to pay the interest on the encumbrance or any part of the encumbrance, although he must bear all other burdens.[49] A grantor in a deed reserving a life estate for himself who pays off encumbrances on the land conveyed does not obtain any additional equitable interest in the land where it does not appear that grantee received any benefit from such payment or that he ever agreed to pay the encumbrance.[50] Where the general residue of the personal estate is given to one for life with remainder to another, the interest on debts of the testator accruing after his death should be charged against the income.[51] Where the encumbrance is created jointly by the life tenant and remainderman, after the creation of the life estate, the interest must be apportioned between them.[52] Where there is a life estate in expectancy and the encumbrance is not on the life estate in possession

but on the estates to follow, the life tenant in expectancy and the remainderman must each contribute to the payment of the interest according to the basis of the relative value of their estates.[53] If the encumbrance is paid off by the remainderman or reversioner during the continuance of the life estate, the life tenant must contribute as his proportionate share the interest on the amount during the continuance of his estate.[54] The remainderman or reversioner is not obliged to accept this interest in annual installments, but may require that it be estimated according to the probable duration of the life estate and paid in a gross sum;[55] but if no apportionment is made until the termination of the life estate it will be based on the period of its actual duration.[56] The life tenant is not obliged to pay off arrears of interest accumulated prior to the beginning of his estate,[57] although such interest will be counted as a part of the principal debt on which the subsequently accruing interest must be kept down.[58] A life tenant is under no obligation to pay off the principal of an encumbrance,[59] even to prevent a foreclosure sale;[60] but he may do so,[61] and if he does so he is entitled to call on the remainderman or reversioner for contribution,[62] and has a lien on the property for the amount due.[63] He becomes prima facie a creditor,[64] but may by his conduct be estopped from claiming as a creditor.[65] He cannot, however, claim the right for such payments when made voluntarily with no purpose to bind the remainderman.[66] The rule requiring the remaindermen to pay to the life tenant within a reasonable time their share of the purchase money at a foreclosure sale, to protect their interests, has no application when the foreclosure is due to the failure of the life tenant to pay his own obligation.[67] Payments made in ignorance of the real state of the facts are not voluntary.[68] The amount

Tenant in dower who has redeemed property is entitled to contribution from the heirs, if they desire to enjoy the benefit of the redemption — Hiller v. Nelson, Ky., 118 S.W 292.
Reasonable time for contribution
Where life tenant purchased mortgage against property and then transferred it to third party, any right of remaindermen to rehabilitate their title by contributing their share of cost to life tenant of acquiring the mortgage was an equitable right required to be asserted within a reasonable time, which depended on the circumstances of each case, and where remaindermen had notice of superior mortgage against property and of its purchase by life tenant and subsequent transfer to third party who foreclosed, and first offer of remaindermen to make contribution of their share of cost to life tenant in acquiring the mortgage was in answer filed in suit to quiet title brought twenty-five years after mortgage was executed, sixteen years after life tenant died and after nineteen years of adverse possession by those claiming under the foreclosure sale, any right of remaindermen to rehabilitate their title was barred by "laches."—Ward v. Chambless, 189 So. 890, 238 Ala. 165.
Equities of life tenant and remainderman
Where a mortgagor devised land for life to his wife, who had joined in mortgage, and then to remaindermen, neither the life tenant nor the remaindermen had a superior equity in the land, and, on foreclosure, sale of interests of the remaindermen in exoneration of the interest of the life tenant, was properly enjoined, and, on the other hand, the equities of the life tenant and remaindermen being equal, it was error to enjoin sale of the interest of the remaindermen until after the sale of the life estate.—Brown v. for which the remainderman or reversioner is liable is the amount paid less the amount of the interest which would have been payable by the life tenant.[69] While a life tenant under a deed with power of sale of the remainder could convey his life estate to one person or persons and the remainder to another or others, he cannot rid himself of the liens of his judgment creditors on the life estate except by paying the judgment debts.[70] The remainderman may pay the interest and collect it from the life tenant where he neglects or refuses to make such payments.[71] The equitable interest of a life tenant in land cannot be subjected to payment of debts of one vested with the fee title thereto.[72] Where property is left to one for life, charged with a legacy the amount of which is left to the discretion of the life tenant, who pays certain amounts to the legatee but keeps no account thereof, the estimated amount of such payments cannot be charged against the estate by the life tenant at the expense of the remainderman.[73]

§ 49. Expenses, Deterioration, and Losses

The ordinary expenses of the care and management of the estate must be borne by the life tenant, in the absence of any direction to the contrary in the instrument creating the estate.

The ordinary expense of the care and management of a life estate must be paid by the life tenant,[74] unless there is an unmistakable direction to the contrary in the instrument creating the estate.[75] A life tenant who is also executor is, in the latter capacity, entitled to an allowance for collecting and disbursing funds sufficient to discharge the debts against the testator's estate, to the amount limited by the statute, if any.[76] One having a life estate in part of property is liable for a proportionate part of the expense.[77] No part of the expenses of administering on the estate of the life tenant can be deducted from the fund payable to the remainderman.[78] The costs of a life tenant incurred in litigation over his interest in a trust estate must be paid out of the income and not out of the body of the estate.[79] Where trustees have in the exercise of a sound discretion withheld from the market for the benefit of the remainderman unimproved property, and the appreciation in value of the property has justified their management, the expenses should be charged on the fund, and not on the income of the life tenant.[80] A life tenant is liable for such losses or injuries to the corpus of the estate as are the result of his default or neglect,[81] but he is not liable for any loss or deterioration occurring from natural causes or from accident and without any fault on his part.[82] Life tenants acting en autre droit are entitled to reimbursement for expenses necessarily incurred.[83] The sum of items properly

Employment of assistant by life tenant

Life tenant, under will giving her full power to control and manage a large estate for life, is empowered to engage assistants and agents, but the expense of management is properly chargeable against income, and not against corpus, unless income was insufficient; and an agent so engaged is not liable as individual to account personally for acts as agent, in absence of personal advantage accruing to detriment of estate other than compensation for services rendered.—Rock Island Bank & Trust Co. v. Rhoads, 187 N. E. 139, 353 Ill. 131.

Expenses chargeable

Under will creating trust estate and naming trust company as executor and also as trustee, questions of what expenditures were chargeable against life tenant and what were chargeable against remaindermen were questions of general law; and generally, expenditures should be charged against person or estate benefited thereby, but, if both life tenants of income and remaindermen are benefited, expenditures may be apportioned.—Estey v. chargeable against the life tenant is deductible from an amount advanced and loaned by the life tenant to the estate of the testator.[84]

§ 50. Sale or Conveyance

An assignment of a life estate is a transfer of the entire interest to some one other than the reversioner or remainderman.

An assignment of an estate for life is a transfer of the whole interest of the assignor to some one other than the reversioner or remainderman holding an estate which is larger than that of the assignor.[85]

A sale or conveyance by the life tenant, or by order of court, is discussed infra §§ 51–53, while the right of the life tenant and remainderman by their joint conveyance to grant a fee is considered infra § 88.

Sale of a life estate under execution is considered in the C.J.S. title Executions § 36, also 21 C.J. p 962 notes 77–81, and 23 C.J. p 336 note 65–p 337 note 68.

§ 51. By Life Tenant

A tenant for life of land ordinarily may alien his interest, and a conveyance purporting to pass the fee passes his life estate only, unless made under a power of sale or by consent of the remainderman.

In the absence of a valid restraint imposed by the instrument creating the estate,[86] a tenant for life of land may alien his life interest,[87] and his grantee is entitled to the same estate his grantor had, but to none greater.[88] The grantee takes an estate for the lifetime of the life tenant, or, in other words, an estate pur autre vie.[89]

An attempted conveyance in fee passes only the life estate;[90] it does not affect the estate in remainder,[91] unless it is made under a power of sale or conveyance[92] and in accordance with the provisions thereof,[93] or, as shown infra this section, unless the remainderman has ratified, or is estopped to attack, the sale. Application by the life tenant to the court for leave to sell the entire interest in the land, is unnecessary where the life tenant is authorized to sell by the instrument creating the various estates;[94] but such application is necessary where the instrument does not give him a power of sale.[95]

Where land is devised to one for life, his grantee and those claiming under such grantee are charged with knowledge that he can convey only the estate for his life.[96] Where the purchaser of land from a life tenant conveys it to another in fee, believing himself to be the owner in fee, the recourse of his grantee is on the warranty in his deeds, and he is not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the life tenant.[97]

The deed of a life tenant conveys nothing where his estate has already terminated, as by a sale thereof under execution,[98] or by a previous conveyance,[99]

Recorded conveyance as notice to remaindermen

Remaindermen are not charged with notice of conveyances made by life tenant and recorded subsequent to creation of estate in remainder.—Bolkenburg v. Windorf, 259 N.W. 802, 194 Minn. 154.

Effect of statute favoring bona fide purchasers

A statute enacted in favor of bona fide purchasers from "distributees, devisees, legatees, or heirs at law, holding, or apparently holding land or personal property by will or inheritance from a deceased person," cannot be extended beyond its terms so as to aid a bona fide purchaser from a life tenant as against remaindermen who do not join in conveyance.—Mathis v. Solomon, 4 S.E.2d 24, 188 Ga. 311.

Fraudulent acquisition of fee by life tenant

A deed by a life tenant, who had fraudulently obtained a decree setting the property over to her in fee, is void where made to persons having knowledge of the facts.—Ford v. Ford, 191 N.W. 457, 46 S.D. 182.

Right of court to entertain application

Ratification, estoppel, or acquiescence of remainderman. An unauthorized conveyance by the life tenant may be subsequently ratified or adopted by the remainderman,[2] and a remainderman who ratifies a wrongful sale of the entire property may recover his proportion of the proceeds.[3]

The remainderman will be estopped from contesting the title of the life tenant's grantee by accepting and retaining his share of the proceeds.[4] However, the silence of a remainderman after learning of a conveyance in trust for creditors by the owner of a preceding life estate does not estop him from asserting his title.[5]

To constitute an acquiescence in the sale on the part of the remainderman, the acts relied on must be such as would amount to a fraud on the purchaser.[6] The remainderman does not waive any right in the property by failing to object to the sale before his right to the possession of the property accrues.[7]

§ 52. By Order of Court

a. In general
b. Proceedings

a. In General

The entire interest in land may be ordered to be sold on application of the life tenant where a sale is authorized by statute or where it may be ordered under the court's general equity jurisdiction.

In the absence of statutory authority or equitable grounds, a life tenant of land may not ordinarily apply to the court for the sale of the entire interest merely for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds,[8] and this rule obtains, although the income from the land is small[9] or is insufficient to provide for his support.[10] The court may not aid the life tenant in such a case at the expense of the remainderman's right to do as he chooses with his own estate in the land.[11]

However, pursuant to statutory authorization in some jurisdictions the courts may, on application by a life tenant of land, order a sale of the entire interest in the property,[12] including instances where the estate is subject to contingent remainders or executory limitations,[13] or where the lands are limited over to infants.[14] A sale is permissible under some statutes where it is desired to reinvest the proceeds,[15] or where a sale would be beneficial to the parties concerned,[16] or where it appears that a sale is necessary to protect the rights of the parties in interest.[17] Further, it is within the general powers of a court of equity to order a sale where all of the parties interested are properly represented and action by the court is necessary to protect them;[18] a court of equity may order a sale, although there is no trust and the life tenant has no power of sale under the will which created his estate.[19] However, equitable jurisdiction should be exercised with caution[20] and only in urgent cases.[21] Notwithstanding a sale may contravene the instrument creating the life estate, it may nevertheless be ordered by the court pursuant to statutory authorization,[22] or by a court of equity where it is necessary to preserve the property for the life tenant and remaindermen.[23]

On an application by a life tenant to exchange the land for the reason that the present income is insufficient to pay taxes, the interest of the remaindermen, rather than the interest of the life tenant, is to be considered.[24] A court of equity has no jurisdiction to decree a sale of the fee simple title in order to pay taxes or assessments,[25] or to discharge a lien which the life tenant, to the extent of his interest, has fastened on the property.[26]

b. Proceedings

Proceedings to sell the interest in land on application of the life tenant are governed by controlling statutory regulations.

The jurisdiction of particular courts to order a sale of the interest in land on application of the life tenant depends on applicable statutory regulations.[27]

Under some statutes the sale must be public;[28] while under other statutes the court may authorize the life tenant to sell the property at private sale,[29] with the reservation that the court may reject the amount offered where a substantially higher offer is made.[30] However, a decree which accepts a bid for the property, and from which no appeal is taken, is final and should not be set aside merely because a higher bid is received thereafter.[31]

Irregularities in proceedings for the sale of the property, may be cured,[32] such as the failure to require a bond from the commissioner appointed to sell the property.[33]

Parties, notice, and appearance. A person who is given the use and occupancy of property for life may institute proceedings to sell the property under statutes authorizing proceedings by those having a possessory interest.[34] Under some statutes a life tenant of unproductive land from which the income is insufficient to pay taxes and reasonable upkeep may maintain an action for the sale thereof without joining vested remaindermen as parties plaintiff.[35] Contingent remaindermen may join with the life tenant as plaintiffs; it is not necessary that they be sued as defendants.[36] One who bids for and purchases the property subject to the approval of the court becomes a quasi party to the suit.[37]

Notice of the proceedings must be given to all such persons as are entitled to notice under statutory regulations.[38] In the case of contingent remaindermen, notice must be given, under some statutes, to all those parties in interest and in being who would be entitled to the estate if the contingency on which they would take had occurred.[39] Where there are two sets of remaindermen, the second set being entitled to take only if there is none of the first set, according to some authorities living persons of the second or alternative set must be given notice;[40] but, according to other decisions, persons of the alternative set need not be joined if there are persons of the first set in existence.[41]

The court may appoint some one to represent minors and persons who are unascertained or not in being,[42] and the proceedings are void as to infant remaindermen who have filed no answer either by guardian ad litem or in any other manner.[43]

Irregularities in proceedings for the sale of property do not render the sale void as to remaindermen where the remaindermen in esse were parties to the proceedings and at least one member of each class of remaindermen was present to represent the class.[44]

Pleading; evidence. The necessary facts to justify a sale must be alleged and proved.[45]

Decree. A decree authorizing the sale of lands and the reinvestment of the proceeds in another tract of land sufficiently describes the latter tract if the description given can be made certain.[46]

Where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, the decree is binding on all parties in esse before the court and also on unborn contingent remaindermen in the same class as such parties;[47] but a decree will not bind any one except the parties and those holding under them.[48]

§ 53. Division and Disposition of Proceeds

The proceeds of a sale are divided according to the interests of the parties at the time of sale, and in such manner as is agreed on by the parties or as is directed by statute or by the court.

After a sale of the entire estate in the property, the rights of the parties in the property are transferred to the proceeds of the sale,[49] and there must

Proceeds as substitute for land
Where a sale of land, in which there is a life estate, is made by the order of a court of equity for the protection of those interested, the funds received should be substituted for the land and administered as nearly as possible as the land would have been handled.—Coquillard v. Coquillard, 113 N.E. 481, 62 Ind.App. 489.

Realty exchanged for stock
Where realty was conveyed to corporation in exchange for stock distributed to life tenants, stock constituted corpus of trust and on life tenant's death reverted to remaindermen.—Olcott v. Estate of Charles Frederick Hoffman, Inc., 216 N.Y.S 267, 217 Misc. 399, affirmed 221 N.Y.S. 871, 220 App.Div. 713.

Vesting of life tenant's rights
Where property subject to a life estate is sold under a decree of court, that portion of the proceeds representing the relative value of the life estate vests absolutely in the life tenant and passes to his assignee or be an apportionment of the proceeds between the life tenant and remainderman[50] based on the value of their respective interests at the time of the sale.[51] The court should protect the rights of remaindermen in the proceeds of such a sale,[52] although they may never come into existence.[53]

In the absence of statute or agreement between the parties the usual mode of apportioning, or disposing of, the proceeds is to award to the life tenant the interest on the fund for his life, and the principal after his death to the remainderman;[54] the life tenant is not entitled to have the value of his life estate paid to him in gross instead of the annual interest on the fund,[55] and the remainderman may not compel the life tenant to take the commuted value of the life estate.[56] However, it has been held that the court may, in its discretion, divide the proceeds between the parties according to the value of their respective interests and award to each absolutely his proportionate share.[57] Furthermore, by agreement the life tenant and remainderman may divide the proceeds, provide for a future division, or leave the life tenant in possession of the proceeds.[58]

Where statutes specifically prescribe how the proceeds of the sale of the life estate and remainder shall be disposed of, such statutes must be followed.[59] Distribution of the proceeds to the life tenant and remainderman cannot be ordered where it is expressly required by statute that the proceeds of the sale shall be invested.[60]

Power of sale as affecting remaindermen's interest

The fact that the life tenant had a power to sell does not of itself give him the right to dispose of the proceeds without regard to the rights of the remaindermen.—Frank v. Frank, 137 N.E. 151, 305 Ill. 181.

Delivery of proceeds to life tenant

(1) A decree, which fails to preserve the rights of the parties in the proceeds of the sale but which merely orders that the proceeds be delivered to the life tenant without any check on the disposition of the fund is void as to a remainderman born after the rendition of the decree.—Des Champs v. (2) In suit by life tenant to have realty sold and proceeds divided, consent of the parties is not binding on the court, save as to the rights of the parties consenting, and, to bar unborn remaindermen, the court itself must pass on the merits.—Bettis v. Harrison, 195 S.E. 835, 186 S. C. 352.

Transfer as investment

Where statutes require reinvestment of the proceeds, an order directing a trustee of such proceeds to "pay out the fund accordingly" does not mean that the trustee must rid himself of the corpus; "accordingly" means in accordance with the will creating the estate and with governing statutes, and hence requires investment of the fund;

a void decree during the life estate, the proceeds being deposited in a bank, the remainderman on the death of the life tenant may receive the fund so deposited or decline to accept such fund and take the land in specie.[61] Where the life tenant and remainderman join in executing an oil lease, giving the lessee the right to remove all the oil in the place, it is in effect a sale of a portion of the land, and the proceeds must be apportioned.[62] The life tenant will be entitled to the interest on the royalty during the continuance of the life estate and then the residue, or corpus, of the royalty will be paid to the remainderman.[63]

A purchaser who pays his bid into court or to the parties authorized by decree is not ordinarily chargeable with the duty of looking after the proper disposition of the purchase money,[64] and his title is not impaired by the court's failure to provide for proper disposition.[65] A trustee to whom the net proceeds of the sale are delivered is accountable for the fund, and, pending investment, is responsible for its safe-keeping.[66]

Sale of life estate only. Where the life estate alone is sold, the proceeds belong absolutely to the life tenant.[67]

Allowances. The court may permit allowances, in connection with the sale, for brokers' commissions,[68] for services of a guardian,[69] and for attorney's fees.[70] A statute requiring the proceeds of the sale to be turned over to a trustee for the life tenant and remainderman has been construed to refer to net proceeds and hence to permit such allowances.[71]

§ 54. Lease

With some exceptions and qualifications, as a rule a lease by a life tenant expires at the time of his death.

A tenant for life may lease the premises for any term less than his own.[72] The lessee, during the continuance of the lease, is entitled to the same rights and privileges as the original tenant for life,[73] except that rights and privileges included in the grant of the life estate which were intended to be personal to the life tenant do not pass to his lessee.[74] However, unless the lease is made under a power,[75] a life tenant cannot generally create any term which will outlast his own estate,[76] in the absence of consent,[77] in the absence of ratifica-transfer of the fund to another cause wherein the trustee is also committee of the life tenant, a lunatic, does not constitute such investment.—Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. State, to use of Grah, 165 A. 176, 180, 164 Md. 304.

Effect of executor's power of sale
That the executor of the will under which the life tenant holds is given a power of sale and is directed to take charge of the property does not deprive the life tenant of the power to lease.—Werkheiser v. Friedman, 29 Pa.Dist. 411, 17 North. Co. 113.

General power to lease
At common law it is the established doctrine that a tenant for life, with the general power to make leases, can make only leases in possession, and not leases in reversion or in futuro.—U. S. v. Noble, Okl., 35 S.Ct. 532, 237 U.S. 74, 59 L.Ed. 844.

(2) Where property devised to one for life had been previously leased by the testator, and the life tenant, as an individual rather than as a life tenant, thereafter secured the original lessee's rights as to a portion of the property, he could make an assignment of such rights to be effective after his death.—Waldron v. Wahl, 133 A. 252, 286 Pa. 237.

Joinder of remainderman
Under the law of Hawaii, where contingent remainderman joins in lease by life tenant and lease contains guaranty of possession during its term, the lease is not terminated by life tenant's death.—Christian v. Waialua Agr. Co., C.C.A.Hawaii, 93 F.2d 603, rehearing denied 94 F.2d 806, certiorari granted 58 S.Ct. 949, tion,[78] or in the absence of estoppel[79] of the remainderman or remaindermen, and thus, on the termination of the life estate, a lease made by the life tenant ordinarily terminates, although the stated term for which it was made has not expired.[80] The lessee's interest in the premises is then limited to the crops growing thereon at the time of the life tenant's death,[81] and if there are no growing crops the lessee has no further right of occupation.[82] The lessee of a life tenant is charged with notice of his lessor's title,[83] especially where it is a matter of record.[84]

In some jurisdictions, however, the courts may by statute authorize a lease of the property by the life tenant for a term of years,[85] and it has been held that a court of chancery can ratify such a lease on a showing that it is beneficial to the owner of the fee as well as to the life tenant;[86] further, in some jurisdictions a lessee of a life tenant who dies before the lease expires may, by statute, hold over to the end of the current year.[87]

A covenant for the renewal of the lease[88] or for quiet enjoyment[89] is not binding on the remainderman after the life tenant's death. On the other hand, the lessee may maintain an action against the personal representative of the life tenant for a breach of covenant of quiet enjoyment caused by the death of the life tenant,[90] at least if the lease contained an express covenant of this character,[91] or if the life tenant had a power of appointment by which he might have protected the lessee for the full period of the lease.[92]

Relation after life tenant's death. After the death of the life tenant, no tenure and no relation exists between the remainderman and the tenant of the life tenant,[93] except by a subsequent contract, either express or implied.[94] If the lessee holds over after the life tenant's death, he becomes a tenant by sufferance,[95] or in some jurisdictions, by statute, a tenant at will,[96] or a trespasser.[97] The lessee, by remaining in possession, becomes liable on an implied promise for the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the premises,[98] but not for the rent stipulated in the lease,[99] except as such rent represents the reasonable value of the premises.[1]

However, a tenancy may result from the implied adoption of the lease terminated by the life tenant's death;[2] but a continuance of the original term may not be inferred from declarations or circumstances that are uncertain or equivocal.[3] The mere continued occupation by the lessee does not amount to an adoption of the lease by the remaindermen.[4] The acceptance of rent from the lessee by the remainderman subsequent to the death of the life tenant does not, of itself, constitute a ratification or adoption of the lease,[5] or an estoppel against the remainderman,[6] or an attornment by the lessee.[7] Nevertheless, acceptance of rent by the remainderman after the termination of a lease by the death of the life tenant may, in view of the surrounding circumstances, effect a new tenancy, or a continuance of the old tenancy,[8] and thereby entitle the lessee to retain possession.[9]

Distinctions. Whether an instrument is a letting or an assignment by the life tenant depends on the intention of the parties and on whether the life tenant parted with his entire interest for the term, reserving no reversionary right.[10]

§ 55. Mortgage

A life tenant can encumber his own interest, but, except under certain circumstances, he may not mortgage the remainder.

A tenant for life may mortgage or encumber his own interest.[11] However, unless the remaindermen consent,[12] the life tenant ordinarily cannot mortgage the entire estate so as to bind the interest in remainder, and a mortgage, by him purporting to cover the fee is effective as to the life estate only.[13]

On the other hand, the life tenant may mortgage the entire estate where the life estate is coupled with a power to sell the fee[14] or where the life estate is

Power to sell for reinvestment

Although a life tenant is authorized to sell for the purpose of reinvestment only, yet, there being taxes due on the land and the life tenant having no resources with which to pay them, he can mortgage part of the land to obtain money to pay the taxes, so that the title obtained under the mortgage will be to the fee.—Whitfield v. Lyon, 46 So. 545, 93 Miss. 443.

Power to "manage"

A power given to life tenants to "manage" the property does not vest in them any authority to charge a portion of it with the payment of an annuity to a third person beyond the duration of their life interests coupled with a power to mortgage the fee,[15] or coupled with a power to use the estate for his own benefit with a remainder over of only whatever may remain,[16] or where the mortgage is authorized by an order of court.[17]

The life tenant and the remainderman may join in a mortgage which will bind the entire estate.[18]

Jurisdiction of equity. A court of equity has inherent power to order a mortgage of real estate held by a life tenant with remainder over, if the exercise of such power is necessary to preserve the property and to prevent loss to the life tenant and remaindermen;[19] and this power exists although the grantor of the life estate and remainder interests intended that the property should be held intact.[20]

On an application for authority to mortgage the realty, proper notice of the proceedings must be given,[21] notwithstanding the court may have been in error in finding that an exigency existed requiring a mortgage of the fee to protect all those interested in the land, its decree authorizing the mortgage is binding where it had jurisdiction of the subject matter and of all parties interested in the estate.[22]

Authority granted by the court to execute a mortgage is not exhausted after a mortgage is once placed, where the court by its decree expressly retains jurisdiction to make further orders as to a mortgage of the premises; and under such retained jurisdiction new mortgages refunding the original debt are proper.[23]

§ 56. Contracts and Agreements

The life tenant can contract with respect to his own estate, but his contracts are not ordinarily binding on, or enforceable by, the remainderman.

A life tenant may contract with respect to his own estate.[24] However, a contract or agreement made by a life tenant will not bind the remainderman[25] unless it is ratified by him;[26] and, conversely, a remainderman cannot ordinarily sue on a con-and in derogation of the interests in remainder.—Horwitz v. Safe Deposit & Trust Co. of Baltimore, 192 A. 281, 286, 172 Md. 437.

Necessity for consent of all competent persons

Under the statutes in some jurisdictions the court cannot grant an order permitting the life tenant to mortgage the fee unless the consent of all of the remaindermen or reversioners not under disability is obtained.—In re Brokaw's Will, 219 N.Y.S. 734, 219 App.Div. 337, affirmed In re Brokaw, 157 N.E. 880, 245 N.Y. 614.

Mortgage for taxes and repairs

A court will not grant a life tenant's petition to mortgage real estate for the purpose of paying taxes and repairs where one of the respondents holds a remainder contingent on the death of the petitioner without surviving issue, and another respondent is a mortgagee of the first respondent's contingent interest.—In re Donnelly's Estate, 32 Pa. Dist. & Co. 90.

Management of estate

A life tenant, with power to manage the estate, may agree with a third person to occupy the estate for the purpose of management.—Riddle v. Isaacs, supra.

Execution of contract

A life tenant who permitted a third person to occupy the property and who contributed a stated sum toward the upkeep of the property has been held, under the particular circumstances, not to have thereby entered into a contract.—Binney v. Rhode Island Hospital Trust Co., 110 A. 615, 43 R.I. 222.

25. Va.—Grubb v. Shirley, 5 S.E.2d 475, 174 Va. 204.
21 C.J. p 965 note 41.

Charging estate with business debts

Where life tenant's use of principal of the estate was restricted to use for her comfortable maintenance, the estate could not be charged with debts incurred for benefit of business conducted by life tenant and her husband rather than for life tenant's maintenance and support.—In re Strunnert's Estate, 15 A.2d 360, 339 Pa. 439.

Covenants to run with land

A life tenant cannot create any covenants that will run with the land.—Grubb v. Shirley, 5 S.E.2d 475, 174 Va. 204.

Estate for another's life

Where one who acquired the interest of a life tenant aided a third person in obtaining a lease for a term of years from executors in charge of the property, and such third person agreed to give him a specified quantity of merchandise annually for the term of the lease, the beneficiary of the life estate is not entitled to the benefit of the contract, to the detriment of the succeeding estate, after his interest terminates.—Hamer v. David, 99 S.E. 816, 112 S.C. 211.

26. S.C.—Townes v. Augusta, 23 S.E. 984, 46 S.C. 15.

Acceptance of benefit

Where a life tenant was given a note by a third person to make good a trustee's dissipation of the proceeds of the sale of realty, remaindermen seeking the benefit of such note must take it as the life tenant held it and at the interest rate specified therein.—Hartnett v. Langan, 222 S.W. 403, 282 Mo. 471.

tract made by a life tenant to which he was not a party.[27] An agreement between a coexecutor and a life tenant, entitled solely to the income of certain property, for the payment of certain claims against the estate out of such income is at most voidable, and so far as consummated cannot be repudiated by the heirs of the life tenant, at least without a showing that they were ignorant of their rights in the premises.[28]

Delay of the life tenant does not, of itself, annul a contract by which he has agreed to institute proceedings for a judicial sale of the land as soon as is practicable;[29] the prospective purchasers may ratify the contract and waive their right to rescind.[30]

§ 57. Remedies for Protection of Remainder or Reversion

Particular remedies against a life tenant by those holding future estates in land are considered infra §§ 58–64. Actions by remaindermen generally are considered infra §§ 97 et seq, and by reversioners infra §§ 111 et seq.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 58. Requirement of Inventory

The right of a remainderman to require a life tenant of personal property to file an inventory is considered infra § 134.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 59. Requirement of Security

Unless required by statute, ordinarily a life tenant need not give security to protect remaindermen.

Ordinarily the life tenant is not obliged to give security for the protection of the remaindermen,[31] particularly if he has a power to dispose of, or to consume, the property, and does not act in bad faith.[32]

Where the property is sold and the proceeds are turned over to the life tenant, security is not necessarily required,[33] at least where such tenant has an unlimited power of disposal.[34] However, security may be required from the life tenant on the sale of realty and delivery of the proceeds,[35] especially where security is required by statute.[36]

In the absence of a statutory requirement, the purchaser of a life estate in realty at a judicial sale is not required to give bond for delivery of the property.[37]

§ 60. Equitable Relief in General

The holders of future estates in land may have relief in equity to prevent threatened injury to the property in the hands of the life tenant.

Unless barred by laches,[38] those holding remainders or other rights in futuro, may come into equity, to protect their interest in property in the hands of a life tenant which is in danger of loss, deterioration, or injury,[39] as by a bill quia timet.[40]

On foreclosure of mortgage of fee

On the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by a life tenant and purporting to mortgage the fee, remaindermen have right to object to issuance of deed which would injure their inheritance.—Tscherne v. Crane-Johnson Co., 227 N.W. 479, 56 S.D. 101.

Life tenant as executor with right to sell

The remainderman may have relief even where the life tenant is also executor of a will with the right to sell property for reinvestment.—Amos v. Toolen, 168 So. 687, 232 Ala. 587.

40. U.S.—Buder v. Franz, C.C.A. Mo., 27 F.2d 101.

Such equitable relief will be accorded either to a vested or a contingent remainderman.[41]

A remainderman may have relief in equity when the life tenant is claiming a right to the property adverse to that of the remainderman;[42] but a threat of making a lease, which might extend beyond the tenant's life, is not a ground for equitable relief.[43]

§ 61. Injunction

Injunction is a proper remedy to prevent threatened injury to the remainder.

In a proper case an injunction may issue to protect the estate in remainder.[44]

A remainderman may sue to enjoin a life tenant from committing waste[45] when the injury complained of is irreparable and an action for damages would not afford adequate relief.[46] The injunction may be awarded at the instance of a contingent remainderman[47] and may be granted against a purchaser from the life tenant.[48] The erection of a partition wall and disconnecting of drain pipes by a life tenant has been enjoined as an injury to the inheritance.[49]

§ 62. Accounting

An accounting by the life tenant may be required for the protection of the estate in remainder.

In a proper case an accounting by the life tenant may be required to protect the estate in remainder.[50] Equity will require an accounting where the life tenant has committed waste on the estate,[51] as by the wrongful cutting of timber[52] or the mingling of the property with his own property so that its identity is lost.[53] The wrongful disposal of real property, or of the proceeds of a sale thereof, will warrant an accounting.[54] In the case of a contingent remainderman, plaintiff is not entitled to indemnity but only to an account and an impounding of the damages and an investment of the proceeds for his benefit.[55]

A life tenant who has been given power to dispose of the property cannot be required to account as to property conveyed in accordance with the power.[56]

(2) The trustee in bankruptcy of the remainderman is entitled to an accounting to the extent of requiring the life tenant to disclose the property received; but the life tenant need not account for the use and disposition of the property where he has been given a right to encroach on the principal and it is not claimed that he is disposing of the property in a manner other than is authorized.—Nelson v. Horsford, 208 N.W. 341, 201 Iowa 913, 45 A.L.R. 515.

§ 63. Sequestration and Ne Exeat

The issuance of the writs of sequestration and ne exeat against a life tenant of personal property at the instance of a remainderman is considered infra § 144.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 64. Receiver

A receiver may be appointed for the custody of property subject to a life estate whenever necessary to protect the future estates.

A receiver may be appointed for the custody of property subject to a life estate whenever necessary to protect the rights of the remainderman or reversioner,[57] as, for example, on the failure of a tenant to make necessary repairs,[58] or on the failure of a tenant to pay taxes[59] or other charges[60] on the property.

The cost of the receivership may be equally divided between the life tenant and remainderman.[61]

§ 65. Termination

a. Manner
b. Effect

a. Manner

(1) In general
(2) Death
(3) Limitation
(4) Surrender
(5) Forfeiture

(1) In General

A life estate may be terminated before death of the life tenant or the person by whose life the estate is measured, as by agreement of interested persons or by foreclosure of a prior mortgage on the property.

The life tenant and remaindermen may by agreement terminate the life estate.[62] Termination of a testamentary life estate may occur during the life tenancy if the will expressly or impliedly permits distribution of the estate prior to the death of the life tenant.[63]

In some jurisdictions by statute a life estate may be terminated by filing a petition similar to a petition in equity,[64] and giving notice to all persons interested in such life estate.[65]

Abandonment. It has been stated that abandonment is not usually mentioned as a method by which a life estate may be extinguished.[66]

Judicial sale. Where a life estate is created in property subject to a mortgage, a foreclosure sale of the property terminates the life estate.[67]

(2) Death

A life estate terminates on the death of the person on whose life the estate is limited, while an estate for the life of two persons terminates on the death of the survivor.

An estate for the tenant's own life terminates immediately on the death of the tenant.[68] An estate for the tenant's own life and for the life of another person does not terminate on the death of the tenant during the life of the other person but only on the death of the survivor of these two persons,[69] and an estate to two persons for and during their natural life continues during the life of each, and is terminated only at the death of the survivor.[70] An

Judgment and execution against tenant
Where a receiver has been appointed to secure payment of taxes, the remainderman, although entitled to a judgment for taxes paid by him, cannot have execution against the tenant as long as the receiver applies the income to payment of the judgment.—Keeley v. Clark, 211 N.Y.S. 391, 125 Misc. 541.

Civil death
A life estate is not terminated by the civil death of a person sentenced to imprisonment.—Avery v. Everett, 36 Hun 6, affirmed 18 N.E. 148, 110 N.Y. 317, 6 Am.S.R. 368, 1 L.R.A. 264.

estate for a specified number of years or during the natural life of the tenant expires at the end of the specified number of years or, if the tenant dies during the term, on the death of the tenant.[71]

A usufruct is terminated by the death of the usufructuary,[72] but if given to two persons during their lives no part of the usufruct ceases until the death of both usufructuaries.[73]

Under the statutes in some jurisdictions, the court on the death of a life tenant may make a decree declaring the estate terminated;[74] but such statutes do not authorize the court to declare in whom the title is vested.[75]

Estate for life of another. An estate pur autre vie, that is, one limited on the life of some person other than the tenant to whom it is granted or devised, is terminated on the death of the cestui que vie.[76]

When search and inquiry for the lives on which a continuance of a life estate depends is required by the lease granting the estate, what is reasonable search and inquiry is a mixed question of law and fact, depending on the circumstances of the particular case.[77]

(3) Limitation

A life estate terminates on the happening of a contingency, or on the breach of a condition, specified in the instrument as limiting its continuance.

A life estate is terminated by the event of any contingency named in the instrument creating the estate as a limitation for its continuance.[78] For example, an estate to a widow for life or during widowhood is terminated by her subsequent marriage.[79]

A life estate is terminated by the breach of any covenant or condition which that instrument provides shall terminate the estate,[80] such as a valid covenant against alienation by the life tenant;[81] but a covenant that the grantee will not dispose of the premises under penalty of forfeiting the life estate is not broken by the conveyance of a term of years,[82] and a lease to a woman for life providing that it is only for herself to occupy for a residence and that the lease shall terminate on the violation of any of its covenants is not terminated by the woman marrying a man with children and taking them to live with her on the premises.[83] Further, it has been held that the failure of a life tenant, or his successor, to comply with provisions as to the occupancy and repair of the property, the payment of taxes, and maintenance of insurance does not terminate the life estate.[84]

(4) Surrender

A life estate may be terminated by surrender, which consists in yielding up the life estate to the owner of the next immediate estate in reversion or remainder.

A life estate may be terminated by a surrender,[85] which consists of a yielding up of the life estate to the person having the next immediate estate in reversion or remainder, the lesser estate thereby becoming merged in the greater by mutual agreement.[86] Thus a life estate may be surrendered by a lessee for life accepting a new lease or a grant in fee of the same premises,[87] or by an actual and continued change of possession by mutual consent of the parties.[88]

On the other hand, a life estate is not surrendered by an application for an order of sale of an estate in which the applicant has a life interest, for the purpose of investing the proceeds,[89] or by a life tenant conveying his interest to one of two remaindermen,[90] or by an agreement by the life tenant that the remainderman may enter on the land and build and make permanent improvements thereon.[91] Further, a life estate is not surrendered by the act of a life tenant in consenting to a distribution of a trust fund before his death,[92] or in renting a residence to strangers and living elsewhere, retaining only a furnished room for his own use.[93] In the case of a husband and wife who hold a life estate as tenants in common, the estate is not surrendered by the abandonment of the husband by the wife for a long period of time,[94] or by her remarriage.[95]

Necessity for writing. A statutory requirement that a surrender shall be in writing cannot be dispensed with by calling it a forfeiture and agreeing that it shall operate as such.[96]

(5) Forfeiture

At common law or under statutory regulations a life estate may be forfeited for alienation, for waste, for disclaimer or for nonpayment of taxes, although the mere breach of a covenant does not result in a forfeiture unless it is expressly so provided.

Mere breach of a covenant in the instrument which created the life estate will not work a forfeiture of the estate unless it is expressly so provided.[97] A forfeiture incurred by a life tenant may be waived by the person entitled to enforce it.[98]

The reversioner's right to enforce a forfeiture is merely an inchoate right until decreed by a court of competent jurisdiction.[99]

For alienation. A life tenant at common law forfeited his estate by making a conveyance in fee by way of feoffment, fine, or recovery,[1] or by suffering a common recovery,[2] but not by a conveyance by deed of bargain and sale, lease and release, or other conveyance under the statute of uses.[3]

At present an alienation in fee in most jurisdictions merely passes the estate of the grantor, see supra § 51, and does not work a forfeiture of the life estate,[4] particularly where it is so provided by statute.[5]

For waste. In the absence of a statutory provision authorizing the forfeiture of a life estate for waste, the tenant is liable, it has been held, only for the injury done to the estate, and the life estate is not forfeited.[6]

21 C.J. p 971 note 7.

However, under statutes in some of the states, a life tenant forfeits his estate by the commission of waste.[7] Such waste may, for example, consist in the cutting of timber,[8] particularly under a statute providing for a forfeiture if the damages exceed the value of the life estate,[9] or in the construction of a highway on agricultural land.[10] Statutes providing for forfeiture for waste have been construed to apply only to life estates which vested subsequent to the enactment of the statute;[11] further, they have been construed as applying only to voluntary waste,[12] the life tenant forfeiting only that portion of the estate on which the waste was committed.[13]

Equity will in some cases prevent a forfeiture where the injury is repaired by the life tenant before judgment of forfeiture is rendered.[14]

For disclaimer. The common-law rule that a life tenant forfeited his estate by any act in a court of record amounting to a disclaimer of the superior title, as by claiming in himself a larger estate or affirming the reversion to be in a stranger, has apparently never been adopted in this country.[15] At any rate, neither a parol disclaimer of rights of the reversioner or remainderman,[16] nor the claiming of a fee by the life tenant[17] in a court of equity,[18] nor the acceptance of a deed of the fee by a life tenant from a person whose title is hostile to that of the reversioner[19] constitutes a disclaimer within the operation of this rule.

For nonpayment of taxes. Under some statutes, where a life tenant permits the land to be sold for taxes and does not redeem the same within the period prescribed by statute, his estate may be forfeited.[20] However, the life estate is not forfeited under such statutes where a third person purchases the land at the tax sale for the life tenant,[21] or where the sale is invalid so that no valid deed can be made to the purchaser at the tax sale.[22]

A statute providing for the forfeiture of a life estate for permitting a sale for nonpayment of taxes by the life tenant does not apply to a sale for the nonpayment of a special assessment for a local improvement.[23]

b. Effect

On the termination of a life estate, rights claimed through the life tenant cease and the remainderman is entitled to possession.

On the determination of a life estate in any manner the remainderman has a right to immediate possession;[24] no interest passes to the life tenant's heirs[25] or to his personal representatives.[26] The termination of the life estate ordinarily brings to an end all rights under the life tenant's leases, see su-

§ 66. Adverse Possession

a. During life estate
b. After termination of life estate

a. During Life Estate

(1) In General
(2) Adverse possession by or against third persons

(1) In General

As a general rule the possession of a life tenant, or of persons claiming through him, is not adverse to the holders of the future estates, but the authorities are in some disagreement as to whether such possession may become adverse.

As a general rule, the possession of a life tenant or of one acquiring his interest is not adverse to the remainderman or reversioner.[28] Thus, except as the rule has been modified or abrogated by statute,[29] possession through or under a conveyance made by a tenant for life does not become adverse to the remainderman or reversioner until after the death of the life tenant, whether the conveyance purports to transfer only the life estate or the title in fee simple.[30] Further, where a person purchases the life estate of the life tenant and the interest of a cotenant in remainder, his possession during the life of the life tenant is not adverse to the other cotenants of the remainder.[31] The life tenant or his

Acquisition of life estate by remainderman Possession of one remainderman under execution sale against life tenant is not adverse to others, being grantee is not presumed or deemed to hold adversely to the remainderman before the death of the life tenant;[32] on the contrary, the presumption is that the possession of the life tenant or one holding under or through him is not adverse.[33] These principles have their basis in the rule that, during the existence of the life estate, the remainderman or reversioner has no right to possession and consequently cannot bring an action to recover it.[34]

However, in some jurisdictions, statutes permit a remainderman to sue to quiet title during the existence of the life estate, and, according to some authorities, the effect of such statutes is to permit title by adverse possession to be acquired against a remainderman before the termination of the life estate;[35] but, according to other authorities, such statutes do not alter the general rule that adverse possession does not commence to run against a remainderman until the death of the life tenant.[36]

Change in character of possession. It is sometimes broadly stated that a life tenant cannot, by his declarations, acts, or claims of a greater or different estate, make it adverse so as to enable himself or those claiming under him to invoke the statute of limitations.[37] On the other hand, it has been asserted that the rule supposes an uninterrupted continuation of the relation of life tenant and remainderman, and that it does not apply where there has been an ouster and disseizin by the life tenant, or one claiming through him, under claim of right or color of title, followed by adverse possession for the statutory period.[38] Thus, according to some of the authorities, the possession of a life tenant may become hostile and adverse to that of the remainderman or reversioner when knowledge is clearly conveyed to him that the person in possession claims entire title in his own right, adverse and hostile to any claims or interest in the land by the remainderman or the reversioner or others claiming through either of them.[39]

In any event, the possession of one holding a life estate does not become adverse to the holder of the future estate unless the life estate is renounced,[40] and notice is clearly conveyed to the remaindermen that their property is being held or claimed adversely and not under the life tenancy.[41] The remain-

Life tenant as original grantor

The fact that the life tenant was the original grantor does not enable him to make his possession adverse where he reserved no rights other than a life estate, and the statutes provide that no future interest can be defeated by act of the owner of the precedent interest.—Woman's Home & Foreign Missionary Soc. of Presbytery of Los Angeles v. What constitutes renunciation

(1) Renunciation of life estate, to enable life tenant to assert adverse claim, must be unequivocal act by him which destroys his claim as life tenant and which accelerates and matures the remainder.—Superior Oil Corporation v. Alcorn, 47 S.W.2d 973, 242 Ky. 814.

Wis.—Wanta v. Potrykus, 240 N.W. 183, 207 Wis. 282, modified on oth-

derman is not charged with the duty of keeping his estate under constant observation;[42] he is not bound to notice a possession taken and continued by virtue of a conveyance from the life tenant.[43]

In order for a purchaser from a life tenant to convert his possession into an adverse holding against the remainderman, he must do much more than would be required to establish an adverse holding by a stranger;[44] such person cannot during the life of the life tenant claim adverse possession where no attempt is made to convey the remainder interest to him[45] or where he knew that he was receiving only a life estate.[46]

Adverse possession as between life tenants. One of several life tenants cannot ordinarily acquire title by limitation as against the others.[47]

(2) Adverse Possession by or against Third Persons

During the existence of the life estate, a stranger may establish adverse possession against the life tenant, but not, as a rule, against the remainderman. A life tenant can hold adversely as against third persons.

A stranger to the title may, during the life of the life tenant, establish an adverse possession as against the life tenant and acquire title thereby to the life estate.[48] Where the owner of a life estate has lost it by the adverse possession of another, the life estate vests in such other and is not defeated until the death of the life tenant; and the remainderman or reversioner has no right to recover the land from such disseizor until such time.[49] The life tenant cannot thereafter confer any greater right on the remainderman by any act on his part, such as a surrender or conveyance.[50]

Adverse possession against remaindermen or reversioners. As a general rule a stranger cannot during the existence of the life estate establish an adverse possession as against remaindermen or reversioners so as to bar their interest;[51] but it

Life tenant's secret intention is insufficient notice of adverse claim to remainderman.—Superior Oil Corporation v. Alcorn, 47 S.W.2d 973, 242 Ky. 814.

Positive act, etc., as essential "Adverse possession does not run in favor of a life tenant against the remainderman without some clear positive overt act, or express notice."—Trimble v. Gordon, 109 S.W. 2d 1217, 1219, 270 Ky. 476.

Ordinary acts of ownership
The life tenant's holding is not adverse where he does nothing more than engage in ordinary acts of ownership and rights of possession, control, and management.—Trimble v. Gordon, supra.

Conveyance as notice
Life tenant's conveyance purporting to pass fee simple was not notice to remaindermen of grantee's adverse claim.—Rae v. Baker, Tex. Civ.App., 38 S.W.2d 366, error refused.

Disclosure of basis of claim
The life tenant must disclose to the remainderman the basis of his adverse claim.—Superior Oil Corporation v. Alcorn, 47 S.W.2d 973, 242 Ky. 814.

Notice as to part of land
Adverse possession by life tenant's grantee of part of the land will not inure to the benefit of a grantee of a different part so as to constitute notice that all the land is being held adversely to the remainderman.—Gibbs v. Barkley, Tex.Com.App., 242 S.W. 462, reversing Barkley v. Gibbs, Civ.App., 233 S.W. 134.

Purchase by life tenant after foreclosure
The purchase of the property by the life tenant from one who had purchased it at a mortgage foreclosure sale, and the continued occupancy of the premises, the recordation of the deed and the improvement of the property by the life tenant, are some evidence of notice to the remaindermen of the nature of his claim.—Miller v. Marriner, 121 S.E. 770, 187 N.C. 449.

44. Ky.—Bates v. Adams, 206 S.W. 163, 182 Ky. 100.

Special equity in favor of purchaser
The life estate may be considered terminated as though the life tenant had died where there is some special independent equity in favor of a purchaser from the life tenant.—Commercial Bldg. Co. v. Parslow, 112 So. 378, 93 Fla. 143.

45. Ky.—Boggess v. Crail, 5 S.W.2d 906, 224 Ky. 97.

Failure to convey vested remainder
The interest of a vested remainderman is not barred by adverse possession where the one asserting the adverse claim was a grantee only of the life estate and the interest of a contingent remainderman.—Boggess v. Crail, supra.

Color of title
A quitclaim deed from one obtaining a void decree quieting title against a remainderman is sufficient to give the grantee color of title even though the purchaser knew of the possibility of a future hostile claim.—Nevelier v. Foster, 173 N.W. 879, 186 Iowa 1307.

Forfeiture by life tenant
If the life tenant incurs a forfeiture, the remainderman is not required to treat the life estate as merged in the remainder and enter immediately, but may wait until aft-

seems, according to some authorities, that a contingent remainder may be defeated by the adverse possession of a stranger during the existence of the life estate.[52] At any rate, the fact that possession is adverse to the life tenant does not per se make it adverse to the remainderman;[53] and asserting a claim by adverse possession to a life estate only cannot perfect title to a larger estate either in himself or in those claiming through him.[54]

Where an adverse holding has been established against the owner of the fee simple, the subsequent creation of a life estate does not prevent the disseizor from acquiring title by continued adverse possession during the life of the life tenant as against the remainderman or reversioner.[55]

Adverse possession against third persons. The possession of the life tenant may be adverse as against third persons so as to create a valid title by adverse possession in favor of the life tenant and the remainderman or reversioner.[56]

b. After Termination of Life Estate

After the death of the life tenant, his grantee and other persons may hold adversely against the remainderman or reversioner, although it has been held that some positive act of disclaimer is necessary on the part of the grantee.

After the determination of the life estate, the possession of a person who had disseized the life tenant, or of a grantee of the life tenant holding under a deed conveying the fee simple, is deemed adverse to the remainderman or reversioner,[57] and if after the termination of the life estate the remainderman or reversioner permits the heirs or representatives of the life tenant to retain possession under claim of title, such possession will be adverse so as to bar in time the title of the remainderman.[58] However, it has been held that the possession of grantees of a life tenant does not become hostile to the title of the remaindermen after the death of the life tenant until some positive act of disclaimer is conveyed to the remaindermen,[59] and that a hostile claim of adverse possession cannot be based simply on continued possession by such grantees.[60] The possession of a grantee of a life tenant does not become adverse on the death of the life tenant where the deed to him purports to convey only a life estate.[61]

§ 67. Actions by or against Life Tenants

A life tenant may sue for injuries to his own es-er the death of the life tenant without being affected by any possession prior to the death of the life tenant.—Moore v. Luce, 29 Pa. 260, 72 Am.D. 629.

Lands in excess of life estate

Where a widow by failing to make timely claim had lost her right to a life estate in lands exceeding the homestead, third persons could hold such excess adversely to the remaindermen before the widow's death.—Falvey v. Hicks, 286 S.W. 385, 315 Mo. 442.

Purchase of life estate and interest in fee

The purchasers of the interest of an individual who owned a life estate in all the land and the fee to a part thereof did not, on the life tenant's death, commence to hold adversely to the remainderman where they did not affirmatively apprise the remainderman that they claimed adversely; in such case on the death of the life tenant the purchasers became tenants in common with the remainderman and the presumption obtained that the possession of one was possession of all.—Dunlavy v. Lowrie, 25 N.E.2d 67, 372 Ill. 622.

Express or constructive notice

(1) Express notice has been held to be necessary.—Gates v. Colfax Northern R. Co., 159 N.W. 456, 177 Iowa 690—21 C.J. p 976 note 59 [a].

(2) On the other hand, it has been held that even if notice of an adverse holding is necessary, such notice may be constructive and will be presumed to have been brought home to remaindermen when adverse occupancy and claim of title are long continued, open, notorious, exclusive, and inconsistent with existence of title in others, except occupant.—Griffin v. Reynolds, Tex.Civ.App., 107 S.W.2d 634, error dismissed.

Sufficiency of deed

A life tenant's deed to a school district, "its successors and assigns forever," is sufficient to support a claim of adverse possession commencing on the death of the life tenant.—Ontelaunee Orchards v.

tate, but generally he may not sue for injuries to the inheritance.

A life tenant may sue for any injury occasioned to his possession and right of enjoyment.[62] Thus he may sue for injuries occasioned by the construction[63] or operation[64] of a railroad on the land, or by the opening of a street through his premises without condemnation and compensation,[65] or by interference with an easement right to an alley,[66] or by the maintenance of a nuisance on adjoining land,[67] or by waste committed by an adverse claimant.[68] He may maintain an action of trespass quare clausum fregit and recover such actual damages as he sustains to his possession,[69] or an action of ejectment,[70] or, in a proper case, a suit for partition.[71] A life tenant may maintain an action for depreciation in rental value and time and money spent in repairs made necessary by the inadequacy of a city sewer.[72]

On the other hand, a life tenant cannot, as a general rule, maintain an action for any injury to the inheritance.[73] Thus it has been held that a life tenant may not maintain an action for damage caused by a defective street drain[74] or by a change in street grade,[75] nor may he maintain an action of trover,[76] or of trespass de bonis[77] for the cutting of timber on the land,[78] unless in such cases he has previously satisfied the remainderman or reversioner.[79] However, it has also been held that a life tenant may recover for injuries caused by the negligence of a stranger, including not only injuries to the life estate but also to the remainder.[80]

Where the land is in possession of the remainderman, who cultivates it as a tenant of the owner of the life estate, paying no rents except the payment of the taxes, the life tenant cannot maintain an action for injury to the crops.[81]

Separate rights of life tenant and remainderman. Although both a life tenant and remainderman can sue for damages where a tort on realty affects each estate, their rights are separate and independent.[82] The life tenant and remaindermen may recover in separate actions for their damages for injuries caused by the construction of a railway cut and grade through the premises and in front of the residence, the life tenant for loss to present enjoyment and the remaindermen for permanent injury to the property.[83]

Parties. A life tenant may maintain an action for an injury to his own estate without making the remaindermen parties,[84] and, indeed, if the injury complained of is one to the life estate only, it is not proper to join the remaindermen as parties plaintiff.[85] However, all persons whose rights or interests are directly involved in an action by a life tenant must be joined as parties.[86]

As a general rule, the life tenant may join with the remainderman in an action to recover for the injury to the interests of both.[87] It has been held to be proper for both to join in an action of ejectment,[88] or a statutory action of trespass on the case on account of illegal mining,[89] or an action to recover for the destruction of property by negligence,[90] or an action for damages resulting from the construction of a railroad on the land.[91]

Where the action is to recover the proceeds of a sale of the entire estate, all of the persons interested in the fund must be made parties,[92] although as to remaindermen it is sufficient that the holder of the first vested estate of inheritance be included.[93]

A life tenant who seeks to compel the remainderman to pay a proportionate part of an assessment for a permanent improvement must make the city a party.[94] When an action is brought by the life tenant to recover his share of the fund assessed as damages for the taking of property by eminent domain, the remainderman is entitled as a matter of right to intervene.[95]

Pleadings; evidence. In proceedings by or against the holder of a life estate the pleadings[96] and evidence[97] must be sufficient to justify the relief sought.

A life tenant who seeks to compel a remainderman to pay a part of an assessment for a permanent public improvement by enforcing the lien against the remainderman by way of equitable contribution or subrogation must aver and prove that he has discharged the lien for the cost.[98]

Damages. A life tenant can recover damages only for the injury done to the life estate,[1] which, in an action of trespass, consists of the injury to the life tenant's possessory interests.[2] In the case of the destruction of a growing crop, the life tenant is entitled to recover the amount of the entire injury.[3] In every case the measure of damages is the amount necessary to make good the actual loss sustained by the life tenant.[4]

Where damages have been awarded or recovered as an entirety they may be apportioned equitably between the life tenant and the other parties in interest.[5] If a dispute arises between the parties, the money may be paid into court,[6] or may be paid out to the claimant on giving such security as is deemed necessary by the court.[7]

V. REMAINDERS

§ 68. Definition, Nature and Incidents

A remainder is a remnant of an estate in land, depending on a particular prior estate created at the same time and by the same instrument, and limited to arise immediately on the determination of the prior estate.

At common law, and under statute, a remainder is a remnant of an estate in land, depending on a particular prior estate,[8] created at the same time and by the same instrument and limited to arise immediately on the determination of the prior estate[9] and not in abridgment of it.[10]

A remainderman always takes by purchase, and never by descent;[11] and it is not essential to the validity of remainders that they be equally divided among the remaindermen.[12] Among the incidents of the ownership of real property pertinent to a consideration of remainders are: (1) The estate (the quantum of the right, title and interest) therein. (2) The enjoyment and possession thereof.[13]

In some jurisdictions estates in remainder are not recognized,[14] and, as is noticed in § 84 infra, common-law remainders have been abolished by statute in other jurisdictions.

§ 69. Vested Remainders

A vested remainder is one where a present interest passes to a certain and definite person, to be enjoyed in future; and it is distinguished from a contingent remainder in that it has a present capacity to take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the particular estate.

Unless otherwise defined by statute, a vested remainder is one where a present interest passes to a certain and definite person, to be enjoyed in futuro.[15] Vested remainders are also sometimes called

Many attempts have been made to formulate a criterion by which a vested remainder may always be distinguished from a contingent remainder,[19]

Power to convey fee simple

(1) It has been held that the distinction between a vested and a contingent remainder may be determined by inquiring whether the owner being sui juris can by uniting with the owner of the particular estate convey a fee simple title.—Faber v. Police, 10 S.C. 376.

(2) This test is inapplicable, however, to a remainder, which is vested subject to a divesting contingency, or which is given to a class some of whom are not in esse.—Walker v. Alverson, 68 S.E. 966, 87 S.C. 55, 30 L.R.A.,N.S., 115.

A remainder which is technically vested but liable to be defeated by the death of the remainderman before the death of the life tenant is not substantially different, as far as the value of the interest is concerned, from a vested interest in a

and, while there is confusion among the authorities on this question,[30] it is generally held that the distinguishing characteristic of a vested remainder is a present capacity to take effect in possession, if the possession were to become vacant.[21] This description, however, probably does not fully cover the distinction at common law;[22] and it has been said that the true criterion of a vested remainder is the existence (1) in an ascertained person (2) of a present fixed right (3) of future enjoyment of the estate limited in remainder (4) which right will take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the precedent estate, (5) irrespective of any collateral event, (6) provided the estate in remainder does not determine before the precedent estate.[23]

That an estate in remainder is vested does not imply a certainty that it will ever actually take effect in possession, because every remainder of a life estate or a fee tail is subject to uncertainty in this respect, consequent on the possibility that the precedent estate may outlast the estate in remainder by reason of the death of the remainderman, or his death without issue, before the determination of the precedent estate.[24] Neither does it imply any certainty as to the quantity and value of the remainderman's interest; since a remainder may be vested, although the amount of the estate remaining undisposed of at the expiration of the particular estate is uncertain, as where the first taker is given a power of appointment or disposition,[25] with remainder limited over in default of the exercise of such power.[26]

Divesting of remainder. A vested remainder may be limited or conditioned to divest on the happening of a named event;[27] and such a remainder is an estate subject to a condition subsequent.[28]

§ 70. Contingent Remainders

Contingent remainders are sometimes called executory remainders.

Contingent remainders are sometimes called executory remainders.[29]

§ 71. Definition

A contingent remainder is one where the estate in remainder is limited either to a dubious and uncertain person, or on the happening of a dubious and uncertain event.

on the happening of a dubious and uncertain event.[30] A remainder may be rendered contingent by reason of a condition subsequent as well as a condition precedent.[31]

Classes. Contingent remainders have been divided into four classes.[32]

The first class is that where the remainder depends entirely on a contingent determination of the particular estate itself, that is, where the particular estate is limited to determine on either of several events, one of which may never happen, and the remainder is to take effect only in case the particular estate is determined by the happening of such uncertain event.[33] Some forms of limitation, however, constitute apparent exceptions to this class of contingent remainders as, for example, after a life estate to the testator's wife, if she shall so long continue his widow, a life estate in remainder to another to take effect on the widow's remarriage.[34] Remainders of this first class differ from conditional limitations or executory devises after a life estate, to which they bear a superficial resemblance, in that a contingent remainder of the first class is limited to commence on the occurrence of one of several events by which the particular estate was originally limited, while a conditional limitation is limited to commence on a condition which is independent of the original measure or extent of the particular estate and which may terminate the particular estate before the time specified for its regular determination.[35]

The second class of contingent remainders is that where some uncertain event unconnected with, and collateral to, the determination of the preceding estate is by the nature of the limitation to precede the remainder.[36]

A contingent remainder of the third class is one limited to take effect on an event which, although it certainly must happen some time or other, yet may not happen until after the determination of the particular estate.[37]

The fourth class of contingent remainders is that where a remainder is limited to a person not ascertained or not in being at the time when such limitation is made.[38] Some forms of limitations, however, constitute apparent exceptions to this fourth class as, for example, a remainder limited to the heirs of the grantor; while such a limitation is designated as a remainder, it is not in reality a remainder, but is an estate which continues in the grantor as the reversion in fee.[39]

§ 72. Characteristics

A contingent remainder is not strictly an estate, but a mere chance of having one, if the contingency turn out favorably to the remainderman.

While a contingent remainder is an interest in land,[40] which is valuable,[41] and which will be protected by a court of equity,[42] it is not strictly an estate, but a mere chance of having one, if the contingency turn out favorably to the remainderman.[43] It may, however, be raised to the dignity of an estate by statute.[44]

A remainder subject to a power of appointment is not necessarily vested;[45] and the exercise by the tenant of the particular estate of a power of appointment granted him will prevent a contingent remainder from vesting.[46]

As is shown supra § 69, a contingent remainder is distinguished from a vested remainder in that it has a present incapacity to take effect in possession should the possession become vacant.

§ 73. Remainders to Class

A remainder limited to a class consisting of children or more remote relatives vests in such of the objects as are in esse and answer the description at the time the instrument creating the remainder takes effect, subject to open and let in any who may be afterward born before the determination of the particular estate.

A remainder limited to a class consisting of children or more remote relatives such as grandchildren, brothers, sisters, nephews, nieces, and cousins vests in such of the objects as are in esse and answer the description at the time the instrument creating the remainder takes effect,[47] subject to open and let in any who may be afterward born before the determination of the particular estate.[48] However, according to some authorities, in the absence of a contrary intent, the class is not ascertained until the death of the life tenant.[49] Where a contingent remainder is given to a class of persons by description and the contingency consists not merely in the uncertainty of the persons by whom the estate is to be taken but also in events disconnected with the persons to take, the estate vests in the persons answering the description when the contingency happens.[50]

As to unborn members of a class, the remainder is contingent until they come in esse, and then it immediately vests.[51] Vested remainders to members of a class open to let in adopted children[52] and illegitimate children who have been legitimatized by the subsequent marriage of their parents.[53]

Where the remainder is to a class of persons definitely described,[54] or to the survivors of a class,[55] only those persons answering the description who are in being when the contingency happens can take.

Statutory provisions. Under some statutes a remainder limited to a class of persons in existence, with words of present gift, and not words of futurity showing an intention to postpone vesting of gift until the determination of the particular estate, must be construed as a vested remainder,[56] although it cannot be ascertained until the determination of the particular estate which, if any, members of the class will ultimately take.[57]

§ 74. Cross Remainders

Cross remainders are remainders which are so limited after particular estates to two or more persons in several parcels of land, or in several undivided shares in the same parcel of land, that, on the determination of the particular estates in any of the several parcels or undivided shares, they remain over to the other grantees, and the reversioner or ulterior remainderman is not let in until the determination of all of the particular estates.

Cross remainders are remainders limited after particular estates to two or more persons, in several parcels of land, or in several undivided shares in the same parcel of land in such way that, on the determination of the particular estates in any of the several parcels or undivided shares, they remain over to the other grantees, and the reversioner or ulterior remainderman is not let in until the determination of all of the particular estates.[58] In the case of cross remainders, the estates usually have been granted originally to the several persons in common, but sometimes the particular estates are held in severalty.[59]

The rule of cross remainders does not operate in the case of joint tenancy;[60] and, where they are to be raised between more than two, the presumption is against them.[61]

§ 75. Double Contingencies

Two or more remainders in fee simple may be created as substitutes or alternatives the one for the other.

A remainder cannot, as shown infra § 78, be limited after a fee simple. This rule, however, forbids neither at common law nor under modern statutes, the creation of limitations variously called contingencies with a double aspect, or gifts on a double contingency, or gifts or devises on two alternative contingencies or alternative or substitutional remainders, whereby two or more remainders in fee simple are created as substitutes or alternatives the one for the other, that is, on such contingencies that only one of the remainders can possibly vest.[62]

As distinguished from successive remainders, each of such fees is a remainder in regard to the particular estate, but none is a remainder in regard to any other of them;[63] and as distinguished from a vested remainder subject to a condition subsequent with a limitation over, it is a true remainder, while the latter limitation over is not a remainder, but an executory interest.[64]

§ 76. Preceding Particular Estate

The preceding estate is called the particular estate because it is only a small part or portion of the whole estate.

With respect to remainders, the preceding estate is called the particular estate because it is only a small part or portion of the whole estate.[65]

§ 77. Necessity

Unless otherwise regulated by statute, as a general rule, in order that an estate in expectancy may constitute a remainder, it must be limited after a preceding particular estate.

In order that an estate in expectancy may technically constitute a remainder it must be limited after a preceding estate called the particular estate,[66] and any attempt to create a remainder is ineffectual if the particular estate cannot take effect.[67] Where there is a legal estate in trustees, however, there is no necessity for any preceding particular estate to support contingent limitations, since the outstanding legal estate is sufficient to sustain them.[68]

Statutory regulations. Under some statutes, a remainder will not fail for want of a particular estate;[69] and statutes now generally permit freehold estates to be created, by will or deed, to commence either with or without the intervention of a precedent estate.[70] Some statutes permit future estates, even fees, to be created to take effect in the alternative, so that if the first in order fails to vest the next in succession shall be substituted for it and take effect accordingly;[71] and it has been held, under statute, that a remainder cannot be limited on an estate for the life of any other person than the first grantee or devisee of such estate unless such remainder is in fee, nor on such an estate in a term of years unless it is for the whole residue of the term.[72]

§ 78. Quantity

A remainder may be limited after an estate tail, or after an estate for life or for years.

The particular estate necessary to support a remainder must be of such quantity as would leave a reversion in the grantor, had the particular estate been the only interest conveyed.[73] Accordingly, a remainder cannot be limited on a fee simple, because that is the entire inheritance, and after a grant or devise of the fee nothing can be left to limit over;[74] and, although there is authority upholding a remainder after a determinable fee,[75] the general rule is that qualified, determinable, or conditional fees are so far regarded as the entire estate that remainders cannot be limited on them.[76]

A remainder may, however, be limited after an estate tail,[77] or after an estate for life,[78] measured by the life of the person to whom the particular estate is given or by the life of a third person.[79] Although the particular estate may be for a term of years,[80] the estate of freehold at common law is during the continuance of such a term, not "a remainder of freehold on a term of years," but rather "a freehold in possession subject to the term."[81]

Under some statutes the principles of the common law regarding the quantity of the particular estate necessary to support a remainder have been considerably modified.[82]

§ 79. Simultaneous Creation

A remainder must be created at the same time and by the same instrument as the particular estate.

Another characteristic of a remainder is that it must commence or pass out of the grantor at the time of the creation of the particular estate,[83] and by the same instrument.[84]

§ 80. Determination of Preceding Estate

As a general rule, a remainder cannot be so limited as to take effect in possession in derogation of the particular estate.

The use, possession, and enjoyment of the property by the vested remainderman commence on the determination of the preceding estate.[85] A remainder must await the determination of the preceding estate,[86] and it cannot be so limited as to take effect in possession in derogation or defeasance of it.[87] A subsequent estate limited to take effect on a condition which is to defeat the preceding particular estate is void at common law as a remainder,[88] unless limited on an event which destroys the particular estate by merging the particular estate with the remainder.[89]

Under statute, however, the contingency on which a remainder is limited may operate to abridge the precedent estate.[90]

§ 81. Time of Vesting of Remainder in General

A remainder is ordinarily defeated unless it vests during the continuance of the particular estate, or eo instanti that the particular estate determines.

A remainder which does not vest during the continuance of the particular estate, or eo instanti that the particular estate determines, is defeated,[91] unless the legal estate is in trustees.[92] A contingent remainder is defeated when the particular estate is altered in quantity of interest, but not when the alteration is merely in quality.[93] A contingent remainder may fail as to one part and not as to another when the preceding estate is in several persons, in common or in severalty, since the particular tenant of one part may die before the contingency happens and the tenant of another part survive it.[94] Although it was formerly a disputed question, a remainder to a posthumous child is not defeated because the remainderman is not in esse at the determination of the particular estate.[95]

Under some statutes, a remainder is not affected, if valid in its creation, by the termination of the preceding estate before the happening of the contingency on which the remainder is limited to take effect.[96]

Some authorities hold that, where a contingent remainder of the inheritance is limited by a conveyance operating at common law, the estate in remainder immediately passes out of the grantor, is in abeyance, where it awaits the contingency, and, if that results favorably, vests in the remainderman, but, if the remainder fails to vest at or before the determination of the particular estate, the grantor or his heirs may reënter.[97] The logical and more reasonable theory, however, is that in such a case the inheritance remains in the grantor or his heirs or in the heirs of the testator, until the contingency happens to take it out of them.[98] Since, as shown supra § 7, the courts consider the theory of a fee in abeyance as odious and never recognize it except in case of urgent necessity, a contingent remainder of the measure of freehold is void ab initio unless supported by a previous vested estate of freehold capable, in its original limitation, of enduring until the vesting of the remainder;[99] but, if preceded by a life estate which is a freehold followed by a term of years, it will be upheld.[1]

A conveyance of a fee, reserving a life estate in the grantor, has been sustained as a remainder.[2]

§ 82. Acceleration of Remainder

A remainder is said to be accelerated where the time for its vesting in possession is shortened by the premature determination of the preceding estate, or where such estate is for some reason incapable of taking effect.

A vested remainder is said to be accelerated where the time for its vesting in possession is shortened by the premature determination of the preceding estate, or where such estate is for some reason incapable of taking effect,[3] whether by reason of death,[4] incapacity,[5] remarriage,[6] renunciation,[7] or any other circumstance resulting in the termination of the whole particular estate, and not merely of the interest of one among several interested in it.[8] A vested remainder may be accelerated, although future contingent interests will thereby be cut off.[9] There is authority, however, that a conveyance or release of the life estate to the remainderman does not accelerate the remainder,[10] nor is the remainder accelerated by the civil death of the tenant of the particular estate.[11]

A remainder will not be accelerated if it is impossible to identify the remainderman, or if there is evidence of an intention to postpone the taking effect of the remainder;[12] but, where the contingencies are determined and the donees ascertained, the doctrine of acceleration applies as well to a contingent as to a vested remainder.[13] There is authority, however, that the doctrine of acceleration is never applicable to contingent remainders.[14] An instrument providing that the particular estate shall terminate on the happening of an event specified may provide for the acceleration and immediate vesting of what would otherwise be contingent remainders.[15]

§ 83. Construction

A remainder is not to be considered contingent in any case where it may fairly be construed to be vested.

The tendency of modern decisions on questions of contingent and vested remainders has been more and more to break away from the technical refinements of the old common-law learning,[16] and whether a remainder is vested or contingent depends on the language employed in the instrument creating it.[17]

However, a remainder is not to be considered contingent in any case where it may fairly be construed to be vested, since the law favors the vesting of estates;[18] and it is a general rule of law, founded on public policy, that a contingent remainder shall be construed to vest when, and as soon as, it may.[19]

§ 84. Statutory Provisions

In the absence of contrary statutory provisions, the common-law principles governing remainders are presumed to prevail.

In the absence of express provisions to the contrary, the common-law principles governing remainders are presumed to prevail.[20] However, the common-law principles have been substantially changed by statute in some jurisdictions,[21] and the effects of such changes are treated supra §§ 68–82. As a result of statutory regulations in some jurisdictions there is no estate in real property known as a "remainder" at common law, but certain future estates in real property may be called a remainder, and may be created by that name.[22]

§ 85. Rights of Remaindermen

A remainderman is not entitled to possession of the property until the termination of the preceding particular estate. Apart from his remedies, at law and in equity, for the protection of his interests, he may be entitled to contribution from his fellow remaindermen, or to redeem the property from a mortgage.

Since, as appears in § 69 supra, a remainderman has only an estate to vest in possession in futuro, he is, as remainderman, entitled neither to actual nor to constructive possession of the property until the termination of the preceding particular estate,[23] so, his rights are ordinarily to be determined as of the time of the termination of the life estate.[24] He may, however, bring an action in equity during the lifetime of the life tenant to preserve the property, as appears in § 98 infra, and, without taking actual possession to complete his title,[25] he is entitled to all the remedies which may be necessary to protect and enforce his right at law,[26] but cannot maintain any action which depends on the right of pos-

(1) Remainderman cannot make any claim of adverse possession until life tenant's death.—Clarke v. Johnson, 148 S.E. 190, 150 S.C. 351.

(2) The occupancy of land by a coremainderman during the life tenancy does not give rise to a presumption favorable to his claim of adverse possession as against the life tenant and the other coremaindermen, particularly where the relations of the parties preclude any idea of hostile possession.—Barnett v. Barnett, 142 S.W.2d 975, 283 Ky. 710.

"If a remainderman be found in possession during the existence of the life estate, the possession can in no way be referred to his title as remainderman."—Hensley v. Conway, Tex.Civ.App., 29 S.W.2d 416, 419.

Possession on request of life tenant

Where one having a remainder in fee went into possession, and made improvements, at the request of the tenant for life, a court of equity will restrain the latter from resuming the possession until he has paid for the betterments, despite the absence of a writing.—Baker v. Carson, 21 N.C. 381.

Removal of oil; right of lessee

(1) Under Illinois law, remainderman may not go on the property to drill for oil during life of life tenant against his will or consent, and life tenant can prevent remainderman from going on the premises during existence of his life estate. (2) Under Illinois law, remainderman could not, as against life tenant, give lessee right to enter and remove oil; but, if life tenant and remainderman join in leases to one lessee, the lessee has the rights of all parties and may remove oil. session, see infra § 98, since the estate of a remainderman is distinct from that of a tenant of a preceding particular estate, the remainderman taking his title by purchase and not by descent, see supra § 68, and holding with privity of estate, but without direct tenure.[27]

Since both life tenant and remainderman hold under the chief lord of the fee under the statute of quia emptores, Statute of Westminster III, 18 Edward I c 1, neither the possession of the life tenant, as appears in § 66, supra, nor that of a purchaser of the land at a sale for taxes assessed against the life tenant[28] can be adverse to that of the remainderman in fee during the lifetime of the life tenant, and, apart from the destruction of the remainder, see infra § 92, the remainderman's estate or rights cannot be, in any way, affected by any act of the particular tenant or his grantee,[29] even though the remainderman is the heir of the life tenant,[30] unless the remainderman represented that the particular estate was an estate in fee.[31] It has been held that a reconveyance of the remainderman's property wrongfully conveyed to a third person by the life tenant will not be decreed under circumstances where such a decree would be inequitable.[32]

A remainderman may purchase a tax title under a sale for delinquent taxes which the life tenant should have paid,[33] and may hold it for his exclusive benefit as against coremaindermen;[34] he need not permit the property to be sold for nonpayment of taxes, but may at any time protect his interest by paying taxes and such other obligations as are imposed on the preceding estate.[35] If a life tenant incurs a forfeiture of his estate,[36] or a devisee for life refuses to accept the estate devised,[37] the remainderman need not enter at once, since a new right of entry accrues on the death of the life tenant.

Where land is purchased with funds resulting from the sale of property subject to a remainder, the remaindermen do not have an equitable estate proportionate to the amount of the trust funds used, but merely a charge on the land, bearing interest from the life tenant's death.[38] A remainderman who effects a settlement of the amount due for life tenant's waste, while the other remaindermen fail to do so is not thereby forced to accept the settlement in full satisfaction of his interest as remainderman.[39]

Curtesy and dower in estates in expectancy are discussed in Curtesy § 11 d and Dower § 27, respectively, and the rights and liabilities of life tenants, with concomitant effects on the rights of remaindermen, in §§ 37–49 supra.

Contribution or accounting between remaindermen. A remainderman who incurs expenditures for the property may be entitled to contribution by the other remaindermen,[40] as where he pays inter-

Purchase not merely payment of taxes

A life tenant whose neglect of duty to pay taxes on land brought about tax sale thereof to remainderman, is in no position to assert that remainderman's purchase of land was merely payment of taxes because of remainderman's duty to state and hence that life estate was preserved. —Duffley v. McCaskey, supra.

Redemption from tax sale

Respecting redemption by remainderman from tax sale, sums paid by life tenant's lessee to equip property was immaterial under lease, providing that improvements remain lessee's property, removable by him after expiration of lease.—Wells v. Henry, 45 S.W.2d 20, 184 Ark. 1114.

est on a mortgage[41] or taxes,[42] or pays for the painting of the property.[43] On an accounting between remaindermen, the propriety of particular items has been adjudicated.[44]

Liability of purchaser. A purchaser of real estate from a widow, having a life estate with knowledge of the limits of her title, who sold part of it to a bona fide purchaser renders himself liable to the remaindermen for the damages sustained.[45]

Redemption from mortgage. The owner of the estate in remainder has a right to redeem property from a mortgage.[46] The right of a remainderman to redeem his interest in the mortgage is not postponed until the termination of the preceding estate,[47] and he may disaffirm a voidable sale and redeem without waiting for the falling in of such estate.[48] However, a remainderman is not entitled to redeem from a mortgagee who is also a remainderman of an equal interest in the equity of redemption.[49]

As a general rule, redemption by a remainderman will not quicken his enjoyment of the postponed estate.[50]

Where the right of the life tenant to disaffirm a voidable foreclosure and to redeem has been lost by laches, and such right still remains in the remainderman, the latter may redeem subject to the mortgagee's right to retain possession during the life of the life tenant.[51] Where the mortgaged property has appreciated in value, the right of a remainderman of a tenant in common to redeem may be limited to the share owned by the devisor through whom he claims.[52]

§ 86. Liabilities of Remaindermen

The liability of remainders to levy under attachment or execution, or to the claims of trustees in bankruptcy, is considered in other titles of this work. The liability of the remainder or remainderman has been adjudicated, in particular circumstances, with respect to taxes, improvements, advances to the life tenant, and the discharge of liens.

A vested remainder may be subject to the claims of the remainderman's creditors, see infra § 89; may be levied on under an attachment, see Attachment § 78 d, or execution, see the C.J.S. title Executions § 36, also 23 C.J. p 335 note 54–p 336 note 56, against the remainderman; may pass to a trustee in bankruptcy, see Bankruptcy § 172 a; and may be sold subject to the rights of the owner of the precedent estate, see infra § 89. A contingent remainder is not subject to attachment, see Attachment § 78 d, but is varyingly held, or held not, subject to execution, see the C.J.S. title Executions § 36, also 23 C.J. p 336 notes 57–59, against the remainderman, although a contingent remainderman has such an interest as will entitle him to resist a levy by attachment on the land to pay a debt of a vested remainderman,[53] and a contingent remainder may be taken by a trustee in bankruptcy, see Bankruptcy § 172 a. The invalidity of a sale under execution may be attacked by a remainderman.[54] Where the court directs that improvements be made on the property and the cost thereof paid from the proceeds of mortgages on the property, it has been held that remaindermen cannot be held personally liable.[55]

The rights and liabilities of life tenants, with concomitant effects on the liabilities of remaindermen, are considered in §§ 37–49 supra.

The question of apportionment of the amount paid by a life tenant or remainderman to discharge liens is said to arise only when the liens were created by other persons;[56] and if a debt secured by a deed of trust is regarded as an encumbrance for which remaindermen, as well as a life tenant, are liable, the latter are subject to loss of their estate unless they make contribution within a reasonable time.[57] Advances by some of several remaindermen to the life tenant personally are not proper charges against the estate in remainder.[58]

Where realty was productive of practically no income during the life of the life tenant, remaindermen were held liable for taxes paid by the life tenant and his grantee during the former's life, less the small income received by the latter.[59]

§ 87. Sale or Conveyance

Contingent remainders and executory devises are governed by the same rule as to their alienation or transmission.

Contingent remainders and executory devises have been said to be governed by the same rule so far as their alienation or transmission is concerned.[60]

§ 88. By Remaindermen

a. In general
b. Vested remainders
c. Contingent remainders

a. In General

It is broadly held that a remainderman can sell his remainder interest. A life tenant and the holder or holders of the remainder may by their joint conveyance grant a fee, at least if the remainder is vested.

It has been broadly held that a remainderman can sell his remainder interest in land.[61] It is further held that a life tenant and the holder or holders of the remainder may by their joint conveyance grant a fee,[62] and that a remainderman in fee, by joining with the tenant of the preceding estate, may convey an absolute and indefeasible title in fee simple;[63] but under other authority this result follows only if the remainder is vested, and not if it is contingent,[64] although it has been held that a life tenant can convey a perfect title by joining all outstanding contingent remaindermen.[65]

b. Vested Remainders

A vested remainder may be alienated or conveyed by the remainderman, the purchaser taking subject to whatever restrictions and limitations there were on the remainder in the remainderman's hands.

A vested remainder is a present interest in the property, see supra § 69, which the remainderman, under or apart from statute so providing, may alienate or convey,[66] during the continuance of the preceding life estate,[67] thereby giving the grantee all the rights that a remainderman could assert,[68] even though subject to be divested,[69] or subject to open to let in after-born children,[70] or although subject to a provision in the will that the property be kept together for the support of the life tenant,[71] or that the remainderman be prohibited from assigning his fee,[72] and however remote or contingent the right of enjoyment may be;[73] but the remainderman cannot convey any present interest or place his grantee in present possession of the land.[74] The purchaser of the remainder takes subject to the rights of the owner of the precedent estate[75] and of prior secured creditors or lienholders.[76] The remainderman may convey his interest to the life tenant,[77] a quitclaim deed being sufficient to accomplish this result.[78]

Only a remainderman or one claiming directly under him may assert fraud inducing the conveyance of the remainder, in order to avoid the conveyance,[79] and such fraud may be waived by inaction.[80] Mere inadequacy of the consideration paid for a vested remainder is not in itself sufficient to invalidate the sale in the absence of any evidence of fraud or of a fiduciary relationship,[81] although such inadequacy of consideration may be a circumstance tending to establish fraud.[82] Any fraudulent misrepresentation by the vendor of a remainder will invalidate the sale,[83] even in the absence of evidence of any trust relationship between the parties.[84]

A remainderman's agreement not to claim a share of the realty of an estate is not sufficient to divest him of his vested interest in land.[85] Remaindermen will not be allowed after the death of the life tenant to rescind on the ground of fraud an agreement for the release of their remainders to the life tenant, where such agreement seemed favorable to them during the lifetime of the life tenant and was not rescinded by them at that time.[86]

c. Contingent Remainders

Apart from statutes providing for the conveyance of contingent remainders, authorities differ as to their alienability; such a remainder is held alienable when the remainderman is ascertained and the uncertainty making it contingent is in the event on which it is limited to take effect. The grantor in a conveyance of a contingent remainder executed before the happening of the event on which it is contingent may, on such happening, be estopped from asserting title, at least if the conveyance contained covenants of warranty.

Under the common law, a contingent remainder, before the happening of the contingency, was inalienable,[87] being regarded as a possibility rather than as an estate in the land;[88] the authorities are said to be in conflict as to whether such remainder is now alienable.[89] It has been broadly held that a contingent remainder, no matter on what the contingency depends,[90] is subject to conveyance[91] by deed,[92] or to transfer,[93] assignment,[94] or, when clothed with its usual attributes,[95] alienation;[96] but under other authority a contingent remainder cannot be the subject of sale,[97] and cannot be transferred or conveyed[98] by deed or common-law conveyance;[99] and it has been said that alienability is not a necessary attribute thereof.[1] More precisely, a contingent remainder is alienable when the remainderman is ascertained and the uncertainty which makes it contingent is in the event on which it is limited to take effect, because in such case the possibility is coupled with an interest,[2] but the interest transferred is subject to the same contingencies in the hands of the transferee as it would have been had it not been transferred.[3] On

"Bare contingency or possibility"
Under a deed conveying realty to grantor in trust for benefit of grantor's daughter during her natural lifetime with provision that at daughter's death the land should go to her surviving children, if any, in fee simple, and, if none, then to revert to grantor, the remainder interest of daughter's son under deed before daughter's death was not a "bare contingency or possibility" within statute providing that a bare contingency or possibility may not be the subject of sale.—Phelps v. the other hand, if the remainderman is not ascertained, there is not a possibility coupled with an interest but only a bare possibility[4] which is not subject to sale or transfer, according to some authorities,[5] although according to other decisions, contingent remainders are alienable whenever the remainderman is in being.[6]

Statutes in a number of jurisdictions provide for the conveyance or alienation of contingent remainders;[7] so, they are alienable under statutes authorizing the conveyance of "expectant estates,"[8] or "any estate or interest,"[9] or "any interest in or claim to" real property,[10] or "all the interest of the grantor unless a contrary intent can be reasonably inferred";[11] but under at least one statute, no person may dispose of a contingent estate where the contingencies are as to the person in whom the estate may vest.[12] Statutes providing that contingent remainders are devisable have been applied in several cases.[13]

A contingent remainder might at common law be released by the remainderman to the reversioner,[14] or to the tenant in possession,[15] or to any person possessed of an interest in the land, although not to a mere stranger.[16] A deed or assignment of a contingent remainder, even if inoperative as a grant or conveyance at common law, may be upheld as an executory agreement and enforced by a court of equity according to its intent, if supported by a valid consideration, whenever the grantor is in a condition to give it effect.[17] Likewise, on the happening of the event on which the remainder was contingent, the title inures to the benefit of the grantee named in a conveyance executed before that event,[18] such conveyance being as effective as if made after such event,[19] and the grantor, or those claiming under him, being estopped from asserting title;[20] but this result has been held to follow only where the conveyance was made by deed with general covenants of warranty or by bargain and sale deed,[21] and not in the case of a deed without covenants of warranty,[22] nor in the case of a mere release or quitclaim deed,[23] nor in the case of contingent remaindermen who are minors and whose interests are conveyed by a guardian,[24] unless such a mode of conveying contingent remainders is authorized by statute, as discussed earlier in this section.

The mode of conveyance usually employed at common law in the case of contingent remainders was a fine or common recovery,[25] operating by estoppel against the parties until the contingency should happen, and after the happening of the contingency operating on the estate as though it had been vested at the time the fine was levied, and for all practical purposes, vesting a complete legal title in the cognizee.[26]

§ 89. Judicial Sale

a. In general
b. Representation

a. In General

Subject to statutory and other restrictions, a court may have power to order the sale of property in which there are remainder interests, for the purpose of reinvestment, especially where, or provided that, such sale is advantageous to the interests of all parties or necessary to preserve such interests for those ultimately entitled thereto; and the court's order must provide for such an investment of the proceeds as will protect such interests.

The power of the courts to sell property in which there are remainder interests has been, in some jurisdictions, expressly provided for by statutes, which have been applied in several cases.[27] A court so authorized by statute, or a court of equity in the absence of such authorization, may have jurisdiction to order the sale of property in which there are remainder interests, including contingent remainders, for the purpose of reinvestment,[28] provided, as appears in § 89 b, infra, the persons in interest are properly represented before it, and especially where, or provided, such a sale is advantageous to the interests of all parties[29] or necessary to preserve such interests for those ultimately entitled thereto.[30] However, such a sale may be forbidden by statute;[31] and some statutes impose restrictions on the court's powers,[32] which the life tenant and the remaindermen cannot by their consent waive.[33] The will creating the estates may forbid such a sale by court order;[34] but a will providing that one of several life tenants shall not sell his interest, does not prevent a sale of the land by the court for the benefit of the other life tenants and the remaindermen;[35] nor will a testamentary prohibition prevent a sale by the court in cases where such a sale is necessary to preserve the remainder interests for those ultimately entitled thereto.[36] A court of equity, in the absence of statutory authority, may be held to be without power to sell where the remainderman is an infant,[37] since any other rule would defeat the clear intention of the testator.[38]

On application of life tenant see supra § 52.
Under attachment or execution see supra § 86.

After-born children

(1) Children afterward born will be bound by the decree, provided it has made proper provision for the investment and protection of their interests in the proceeds of the sale.—Reed v. Alabama & G. Iron Co., C.C.Ga., 107 F. 586.

(2) Where a trustee, representing a life estate, and the special guardian of infant remaindermen, then living, mortgaged real estate under Code Civ.Proc. § 2348, and the mortgage was foreclosed and the surplus moneys deposited with the trustee, the mortgage and foreclosure were binding on after-born children.—Nanreik Realty Co. v. Kiernan, 174 N.Y.S. 726, 106 Misc. 430.

Private sale

(1) Private sale or negotiation, subject to the approval of the court, is held proper.—Poole & Blue v. Thompson, 112 S.E. 323, 183 N.C. 588—McLean v. Caldwell, 100 S.E. 888, 178 N.C. 424.

(2) Private sale, as distinguished from decretal sale, is held improper, although approved by court.—Vittitow v. Keene, 95 S.W.2d 1083, 265 Ky. 66.

Compliance with Torrens system

Where, in suit under Revisal 1905 § 1590, to sell land freed and discharged of all contingent remainders, the suit complying in every particular with the requirements of the Torrens system, an attorney was appointed by the court to represent possible or contingent interests, the title deed by the commissioner cuts off the rights of any other person in being or hereafter to come into being.—Hayden v. Hayden, 100 S.E. 515, 178 N.C. 259.

Restrictions on unsold portion

Where restrictions placed on the unsold portion of land at the time of the sale of the rest, under court order, were the same as those on the portion sold, and were necessary to carry out the trustee's plan in selling the land, they are valid and bind remaindermen who were adults at the time of the sale, made no timely objections, and benefited from the restrictions; but an agreement by the life tenant trustee, subsequent to the sale, and changing or adding to the restrictions on the unsold land is not binding on the remainderman, although ratified by the court two years after the land was sold.—Gittings v. Morris, 144 A. 836, 927, 156 Md. 565.

Jurisdiction of particular courts

(1) An ordinary would not have jurisdiction, on a joint petition of a life tenant and the guardian of minor remaindermen in life to grant an order of sale which would convey a contingent remainder of unborn children.—Ethridge v. Pitts, 108 S.E. 543, 152 Ga. 1.

(2) The jurisdiction of the superior court in North Carolina in a proceeding of this character originating before the clerk is not derivative, since he is but a part of the same court; and the court is not without jurisdiction of such a proceeding erroneously begun before the clerk.—Perry v. Bassenger, 15 S.E.2d 365, 219 N.C. 838.

(3) Where the decree accepting the bid at a judicial sale retained the cause for further order, a separate proceeding cannot be maintained in a different county to recover from the purchaser the amount of his bid, and cannot be treated as a motion in the cause; a court of general jurisdiction ordering a sale of land can afford a complete remedy against one buying under its decree, and the title given by such sale is not affected by the fact that the proceedings should have been brought in the county where the land is situate, no objection having been made.—Crawford v. Allen, 104 S.E. 468, 180 N.C. 245.

38. Miss.—Hoskins v. Ames, supra.

Sales of realty made improperly,[39] or even without authority,[40] may on sufficient showing be ratified and confirmed by the court, where all persons in interest are properly represented in the proceeding, as discussed in § 89 b infra, but not otherwise;[41] and irregularities may be cured.[42] In a sale by a court of equity under its power to order a sale for the purpose of changing the investment, there is no presumption that the court ordered a sale of the property free from the remainders;[43] and no bond need be executed before a judgment ordering a sale is entered.[44]

In New Jersey it has been said that a life estate may be involuntarily sold away from the life tenant only when it exists as an interest in lands the remainder of which is in others who are entitled to possession in some form, either with the life tenant or exclusive of him or in conjunction with him.[45]

Disposition of proceeds of sale. In all cases the order of the court must provide for such an investment of the proceeds as will protect the rights of all persons, including the unborn who have, or may subsequently acquire, an interest therein,[46] as by ordering the reinvestment of the proceeds in the same kind of property, to be held subject to the same conditions as the property sold,[47] or by substituting the funds received from the sale for the lands sold, and administering such funds as nearly as possible as the lands would have been handled had there been no conversion.[48] However, the court cannot order the actual reinvestment of the proceeds until the property has been sold and the net proceeds ascertained;[49] nor has it power to divide the proceeds between the life tenant and remainderman and reinvest only the remainderman's portion;[50] nor may it order a sale of the remainder for the purpose of paying a debt created by the life tenant[51] or to satisfy charges on the land under the will,[52] as there can be no separation of the interests of the life tenant from those in remainder. The purchaser is not charged with the duty of looking after the proper disposition of the purchase money,[53] and when he has paid his bid into court or to the parties authorized to receive it he is acquitted of further obligation concerning it.[54]

b. Representation

All parties in interest who are in being and within the court's jurisdiction must be made parties to a proceeding for the judicial sale of property in which there are remainder interests. Particular parties in interest may be represented by others, as where those of a class in being represent the others of that class.

in some jurisdictions such a sale is authorized by statute,[56] where there are remaindermen who are not ascertained or not in being, a court of equity has been held not to possess the power to sell the property,[57] at least where they are not before the court in person or by representation.[58] A sale by the court has, however, been allowed where in the case of a remainder to a class those of the class who are in being represent the others;[59] or where in the case of successive classes the first class entitled to the remainder is represented;[60] or where a trustee represents contingent remaindermen not in being in cases in which both the life estate and the remainder are vested in the trustee,[61] although not in a case in which the life estate alone is vested in the trustee;[62] or where in the absence of fraud the life tenant virtually represents the contingent remaindermen not in esse;[63] or even where remaindermen in esse are held to represent all contingent remaindermen.[64] However, there can be no representation, and no sale can be ordered, if none of the class to which the remainder is limited is in being[65] or ascertained;[66] or where the remainder was to such children of the life tenant as might be surviving at his death, because until the event it could not be ascertained who would represent the class;[67] and it has apparently been held that contingent remaindermen not parties to the suit are not bound by a decree confirming a sale.[68]

§ 90. Mortgage

A vested remainder may be mortgaged during the continuance of the preceding estate, as may, to the extent to which it may be transferred, a contingent remainder. A mortgage of a remainder may be foreclosed prior to the happening of the contingency on which the remainder was to vest; and the foreclosure of a mortgage executed by a remainderman on his interest extinguishes his interest.

The owner of a vested remainder may mortgage his interest during the continuance of the preceding estate,[69] even though the will by which the remainder was limited operates to effect an equitable conversion of the realty into personalty.[70] A contingent remainder when, and to the extent that, it may be transferred, as discussed in § 88 supra, may be mortgaged,[71] but not otherwise,[72] although under an attempted mortgage, rights may arise which will be enforced in equity.[73] On a breach of the condition of the mortgage, the mortgagee or his assignee may proceed to foreclose it prior to the happening of the contingency on which the remainder is to vest,[74] or, of course, when by the death of the life tenant the contingent remaindermen acquire his interest.[75]

When a remainderman after having fraudulently terminated the life estate mortgaged the property to a mortgagee who was without notice of the facts, the mortgage lien as between the mortgagee and the life tenant covered the life estate,[76] but not so as between the life tenant and the remainderman.[77] The foreclosure of a mortgage executed by a remainderman on his remainder interest extinguishes his interest,[78] and his subsequent deed thereof after the life tenant's death passes no title;[79] but a sale on foreclosure of a mortgage given by a life tenant and vested remaindermen does not carry the interests of contingent remaindermen.[80] Where two remaindermen execute a deed of trust on the property in order to pay back taxes which the life tenant had permitted to accumulate, the entire property will be subjected to the payment of such indebtedness,[81] although a third remaindermen, let in as an after-born child, did not join in the deed of trust.[82] A mortgage executed by one to whom is left a conditional fee, before the happening of the contingency, does not create a lien on the interest of persons to whom the property, under the will, is to go on the nonhappening of the contingency.[83]

In a suit by remainderman to secure an order permitting the mortgaging of the realty, where there are living representatives before the court of every possible interest in the property, the court has jurisdiction to enter a binding order.[84] As appears in § 86 supra, where the court directs that improvements be made on the property and the cost thereof paid from the proceeds of mortgages on the property, it has been held that remaindermen cannot be held personally liable.

The right of a remainderman to redeem the property from a mortgage is considered in § 85 supra.

Benefit of remainderman
The statute providing for sale or mortgage of realty wherein there is a vested interest and a contingent remainder over to persons not in being, and authorizing sale of all or part of the property if interest of all parties requires or would be materially enhanced, did not warrant mortgage on interest of remaindermen to pay for improvements on land by life tenant, since mortgage would not materially enhance interest of remaindermen in view of fact that remaindermen were not liable for as much as fifty per cent of indebtedness arising out of such improvements; and a reduction in interest paid would not materially benefit remaindermen so as to warrant mortgaging of their interest to pay for portion of such improvements, where all savings in interest would inure to benefit of life tenant, and under the mortgage sought to be made remaindermen would be liable for interest on a larger sum than before.—Hall v. Hall, 15 S.E.2d 273, 219 N.C. 805.

§ 91. Destruction of Remainder

A contingent remainder is destroyed by the destruction or regular determination of the particular estate on which it depends, before the happening of the contingency.

Unless, it has been held, the contingent remainder is preceded by a vested remainder,[85] a contingent remainder is destroyed by the destruction or regular determination of the particular estate on which it depends, before the happening of the contingency;[86] but where the devisee of the particular estate preceding a contingent remainder dies in the lifetime of the testator, the limitation over may be construed as an executory devise and the land until the contingency happens will descend to the heir at law,[87] although in states in which the freehold may be in abeyance without detriment to subsequent contingent remainders it is immaterial whether the precedent estate ever vested or not, the remainder passing in either case to the heirs at law until the happening of the contingency on which it is to vest.[88]

Where a deed conveys a life estate, with remainder to grantee's children, grantor and grantee cannot by subsequent agreement enlarge the grantee's estate, or divest the remaindermen of the interest acquired by them under the terms of the deed.[89]

Nonuser. A vested remainder to which there is no right of possession until the happening of a specified event is not forfeited by nonuser before such event takes place.[90]

Revival. It is held that a contingent remainder once destroyed cannot afterward be revived,[91] although if it is destroyed by the levy of a fine by the tenant of the particular estate, the annulment of the fine,[92] but not the reversal of the fine for error,[93] has been held to revive the remainder.

§ 92. By Act of Tenant of Particular Estate

Various acts of the tenant of the particular estate, such as the exercise of the power, conferred by will, to dispose of the entire estate, have been held to destroy contingent remainders; various other acts by such tenant, such as the invalid exercise of a power of appointment, have been held not to have such effect.

The contingent interests of remaindermen may be destroyed by the exercise of the power conferred, by will, on the tenant of the particular estate to dispose of the entire estate.[94]

It has been broadly held that whether an estate in remainder is vested or contingent, a conveyance by the life tenant passes only the life estate, and does not operate to destroy the estate in remainder.[95] Under other authority, unless the conveyance by the life tenant was obtained by fraud,[96] equity will not interfere to protect contingent remaindermen against the destruction of the remainder by the particular tenant, because, since he is not a trustee, his act is not a breach of trust, although it is a plain wrong.[97] Contingent remainders in the absence of a statutory prohibition, but never vested remainders,[98] or a conveyance of the fee with limitations over,[99] may be destroyed by a tortious alienation by the tenant of the particular estate, that is, a conveyance by such tenant of a greater estate than he has in the land,[1] and such is the effect of feoffment with livery of seizin,[2] of a fine by the particular tenant of the legal estate[3] or by a tenant in tail of a trust,[4] of a fine or recovery,[5] or of a valid[6] surrender of any estate[7] other than of a copyhold,[8] or of a writing, such as a will, authorized, executed, and acknowledged as prescribed by statute.[9] However, a contingent remainder is not destroyed by a tortious alienation by the tenant of the particular estate by means of a conveyance derived from the statute of uses, which does not pass any greater estate than grantor may lawfully convey, such as a bargain and sale;[10] or by a lease and release;[11] or by a conveyance by a cestui que trust for life,[12] unless he has power of absolute disposition;[13] or by forfeiture,[14] attainder,[15] or the breach of a condition subsequent,[16] unless the particular estate continues to subsist and to support the contingent remainders dependent on it until an entry is made by the person entitled to take advantage of the forfeiture.[17] Furthermore, a contingent remainder is not destroyed by the disseizin of the tenant of the particular estate,[18] unless in the meantime the disseized tenant's right of entry has been tolled;[19] or by a mortgage by the life tenant and sale under foreclosure in his lifetime;[20] or by a conveyance from the life tenant without notice of the rights of the remainderman;[21] or by an invalid exercise of a power of appointment by the life tenant;[22] or by a failure of the remainderman to exercise his privilege to bring an action for damages for waste;[23] or by the renunciation by the life tenant of his estate;[24] and where a remainder is limited on two lives in being at the time of the grant, it will not be defeated by the failure of an intermediate trust estate.[25]

§ 93. By Merger

In the absence of statutes having a different effect, intermediate contingent remainders are destroyed where the preceding particular estate and the next vested estate of inheritance meet in the same person, whether or not by the act of the particular tenant. Merger involving remainder interests is not favored in equity.

The application of the common-law rule as to the destruction of contingent remainders by merger has been said necessarily to defeat the testator's intention.[26] Merger involving remainder interests is not favored in equity, being allowed only to promote the intention of the parties,[27] and where there is no fiduciary relationship between the life tenant and remainderman.[28] It has been said that equity does not permit a merger which destroys a vested interest in remainder;[29] but no fiduciary relation will be presumed between the life tenant and the remainderman,[30] or between a purchaser of the property at an administrator's sale and a remain-

In the absence of statutes having a different effect, intermediate contingent remainders are destroyed where the preceding particular estate and the next vested estate of inheritance meet in the same person,[32] as where the particular estate and the immediate vested remainder or reversion become lodged in one person, such as the particular tenant himself,[33] or where the particular estate merges either by an act of the particular tenant,[34] such as the acceptance of the reversion in fee before the contingent remainder vests,[35] or a conveyance by deed,[36] and not merely a bond for a deed,[37] by the particular tenant to the immediate vested remainderman in tail or in fee, or to the reversioner,[38] or by the descent to the particular tenant of the inheritance after the particular estate has taken effect,[39] although not if the descent is immediate from the person by whom the particular estate and the contingent remainder were created,[40] unless after the descent the estates are conveyed to a third person.[41]

If the particular estate and the next vested estate of inheritance meet only as to a part of the inheritance, the remainder will be defeated pro tanto.[42] Where the particular estate, the contingent remainder, and the fee are all granted in the same instrument, the particular estate and the fee will not merge so as to defeat such remainder;[43] but it is otherwise where the fee is granted by a subsequent instrument.[44]

Statutes abolishing the destructibility of contingent remainders, as discussed generally in § 95 infra, may prevent the destruction of remainders by merger.[45] Such an act has been held not retroactive.[46]

§ 94. By Nature of Contingency

A contingent remainder may be void because of the nature of the contingency, as where the contingency involves the expectation of an illegal or impossible thing. It may be void for remoteness of the contingency, as involving a double possibility, such as an attempt to give a life estate to an unborn person with a remainder to a child of such person; but some authorities regard remoteness of contingent remainders as now governed by the rule against perpetuities.

A contingent remainder is void if the contingency involves the expectation of a thing which is against the law[47] or is repugnant to any rule of law,[48] or contrariant in itself,[49] or inconsistent with the quality or nature of the preceding estate,[50] or is impossible.[51]

Remoteness. A contingent remainder is likewise void, in the absence of a statutory provision protecting it, as discussed in § 95 infra, if the possibility of the happening of the event on which a contingent remainder depends is not a common possibility, or potentia propinqua, such as death, or death without issue, or the like.[52] According to one theory, a contingency is remote if it involves a "possibility on a possibility" or a "double possibility," that is, if the vesting of the remainder requires the concurrence of two several contingencies, not independent and collateral, but the one requiring the previous existence of the other, and yet not necessarily arising out of it,[53] such as an attempt to give a life estate to an unborn person with a remainder to a child of such unborn person,[54] or a remainder to a corporation not in esse,[55] although, as appears in Charities § 32, the rule is different in the case of a charitable corporation not in esse at the time of the testator's death, but to be formed thereafter, within a period not too remote, or a remainder to the right heirs of a person not in esse, as purchasers,[56] or a remainder to any unborn person described by a particular name,[57] although such a gift has been upheld on the ground that a living person may take that particular name as well as fulfill the description in the usual manner by obtaining it at birth.[58] According to the other theory, which holds that the rule as to a possibility on a possibility has become obsolete, the question of the remoteness of contingent remainders is now governed wholly by the rule against perpetuities.[59]

Successive contingent remainders. Where a remainder over is limited on a contingent determination of a preceding remainder and such preceding remainder never takes effect, the remainder over is not defeated thereby, but will take effect as if it has been originally limited on the particular estate;[60] where the preceding remainder takes effect, but the contingency does not happen, the remainder over will fail;[61] and the failure of a contingent interest preceding a remainder over will cause the remainder over to fail, if it is affected by the contingency;[62] but if the remainder over is not contingent, it is accelerated by the failure of the preceding contingent interest.[63] Where the freehold may be in abeyance without detriment to subsequent remainders, or where the freehold is in trustees and the interests are carved out of the equitable fee, if the contingent interest is void on its creation from any cause, or the contingency on which it depends afterward becomes impossible, or the donee dies before the testator, the next vested interest will be accelerated;[64] but if the contingent interest is valid in its creation, and the event on which it depends undetermined, the limitation over will not take effect until it is ascertained whether the contingent interest will vest, and in the meantime the property will devolve on the heirs or next of kin of the testator or settlor.[65] If the gift

§ 95. Statutory Provisions

The common-law rules governing the destruction of remainders have been considerably modified by statute, as by provisions for preventing the destruction of contingent remainders.

As will appear, the rules governing the destruction of remainders at common law, as discussed in §§ 91–94 supra, have been considerably modified by statute. In the United States, the purpose or effect of a number of statutes is to prevent the destruction of contingent remainders,[67] as by providing that no remainder, whether vested or contingent, may be defeated by any act of the particular tenant,[68] or that no estate in remainder shall be defeated by any deed of feoffment with livery of seizin,[69] or that no future estate shall be invalid on account of the improbability of the contingency on which it is to take effect.[70] Since these provisions do not prevent the destruction of the remainder by natural expiration of the particular estate,[71] it has been expressly provided in some jurisdictions that no future interest valid in its creation shall fail or be defeated by the termination of any precedent estate or estate before the happening of the event or contingency on which the future interest is limited to take effect, and such provisions have been applied in several cases.[72]

English statutes are considered in 21 C.J. p 1009 notes 65–67.

§ 96. Protection; Trust Estates

The legal subjection of contingent remainders to the power of the tenant of the preceding particular estate was overcome at common law by interposing between the particular estate and the contingent remainder a vested remainder of freehold to trustees.

The legal subjection of contingent remainders to the power of the tenant of the preceding particular estate of freehold, as discussed in § 92 supra, was overcome at common law by the device of trust estates to preserve contingent remainders,[73] which consisted of the testator's or grantor's interposing between the particular estate and the contingent remainder a vested remainder of freehold to trustees, so that, even should there be a forfeiture of the particular estate, there would still be a vested estate of freehold, preceding and supporting the contingent remainder;[74] and such limitations in trust to preserve contingent remainders were not executed by the statute of uses, the legal estate in such case remaining in the trustee.[75] A trust estate to preserve contingent remainders might be effected either by giving the trustee a vested remainder, in which case the trustee might, by joining with the preceding tenant, defeat the remainder,[76] which ordinarily would constitute a breach of trust,[77] or result in declaring the land subject to the original limitations in the hands of a purchaser with notice of the breach of trust,[78] although under the particular circumstances of some cases it was held not to be a breach of trust,[79] or by conveying the estate directly to the trustee and his heirs in trust for the tenant of the particular estate, and on the further trust to preserve the contingent remainder.[80] Under special circumstances

equity may, in its discretion, direct the trustees to join in barring the contingent remainders;[81] but equity will never direct the trustees to join for the purpose of enabling any of the parties to sell the estate and disturb the original intention of the settlor or devisor.[82]

Remedies for the protection of the remainder as against the life tenant are considered generally in §§ 57–64 supra.

§ 97. Actions by or against Remaindermen

One who seeks to recover remainders wrongfully transferred by executors need not resort to the courts of the state where the testator died and the will was probated.

In an action to recover remainders alleged to have been wrongfully transferred by the executors of the will, probated in another state, of one who died there, the law of the latter state will be resorted to as the measure of plaintiff's substantive rights, but plaintiff is not required to resort to the courts of that state.[83]

§ 98. Right of Action

Various types of action, in law and equity, are or are not available to remaindermen for the protection of their interests, according to the nature of those interests at the time it is sought to bring the particular action; thus, a remainderman cannot, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain any action which depends on the right to possession, but may do so after the termination of that estate.

A vested remainderman may, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain an action for damages for an injury to his remainder interest;[84] but he may not, during such continuance, sue for an injury to the estate which is not of a permanent character,[85] or obtain partition of undivided interests in remainder either at law or in equity,[86] or sue for trespass,[87] or, even after the termination of the life estate, maintain an action of trover for a conversion during the continuance of that estate;[88] nor may he recover damages for injury done both to the particular estate and to the remainder,[89] unless the bringing of such actions are authorized by statute.[90] Contingent remaindermen are entitled to sue grantee of the life tenant, who permitted the land to be sold for taxes, to set aside the tax title acquired by him.[91] After the death of a life tenant who has allowed the property to be sold through failure to pay the interest on an encumbrance, the remainderman may sue the estate of the life tenant for the damages sustained even though during the lifetime of the life tenant he might have had a sequestrator appointed to apply the rents and income for this purpose.[92]

The remainderman may sue for a tort affecting his estate, although it also affects the estate of the tenant in possession.[93] He may sue for compensation where real estate limited in remainder is taken, either wholly or in part, for a public use, as appears in § 199 of the title Eminent Domain, even during the lifetime of the tenant of the particular estate,[94] since the value of the life estate may be definitely ascertained by life tables;[95] and he may bring suit for waste or destruction against the holder of the particular estate,[96] or his grantee,[97] although a contingent remainderman pending the contingency has no standing in a court of law to recover damages for waste,[98] being limited to his remedy in equity, as will appear in this section. In an action to recover taxes paid by a remainderman for the owner of the life estate, the former was not entitled to a judgment decreeing a lien on the property, and that it be sold to satisfy the judgment, as the action was merely at law for money paid for defendant's benefit.[99]

On the other hand, after the termination of the preceding particular estate, a remainderman may bring partition,[1] and may, under most authorities, maintain an action to recover all rents and profits which accrued after the termination of the life estate,[2] although there is authority to the contrary,[3] but not rents which accrued during continuance of the life estate,[4] even though the remainderman received a release from the life tenant at the time the action was commenced;[5] and a cause of action for injury to the property accrues to a contingent remainderman on the death of the life tenant, although he could not sue before.[6]

Suit may be maintained by the holder of the legal title against contingent remaindermen, whose remainder is a mere expectancy.[7]

Possessory actions. Since, as appears in § 85 supra, a remainderman has no present right to possession, he cannot, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain any action which depends on the right to possession.[8] So, he cannot, during that period, maintain an action to recover the possession of the realty;[9] he cannot maintain ejectment,[10] even if he takes a deed from the life tenant after the tenant's seizin is barred by limita-

Nature of action

(1) A remainderman, to recover for the cutting of timber from land in the life tenant's possession, is not required to bring an action on the case, but may recover in trover, or may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit, or recover under the common count for money had and received.—Jones v. Sandlin, 87 So. 850, 205 Ala. 67.

(2) Statutory action of waste by remainderman as person having next immediate estate of inheritance to recover place wasted and damages is mixed action and not real action.—Thayer v. Shorey, 191 N.E. 435, 287 Mass. 76, 94 A.L.R. 307.

However, it has been held that a contingent remainderman could maintain action at law for recovery of value of standing timber which was removed from the land by one other than the life tenant, and the trial court in exercise of its equity jurisdiction would have duty to make appropriate orders in relation to the life tenant's interest, and secure or conserve the amount recovered for ultimate owners.—Louisville Cooperage Co. v. tions;[11] nor can he, except against persons who are in possession, not under, but in hostility to, the life estate,[12] maintain an action of trespass to try title,[13] nor obtain a writ of entry against one rightfully in possession under the life tenant.[14] However, immediately on the determination of the particular estate the remainderman's right of entry is complete and he may maintain an action to recover the property by ejectment[15] or by a formedon in remainder or a writ of entry.[16]

In equity generally. Both vested or contingent remaindermen are entitled to equitable relief whenever necessary to protect their interest against loss or injury,[17] if defendant or the property is within the jurisdiction of the court,[18] whether the remainderman's interest is in the hands of the preceding tenant for life, as appears in § 60 supra, or some other person,[19] and even during the life of the life tenant;[20] but when such necessity does not exist the remainderman is not entitled to equitable relief.[21] In general, before expiration of the preceding estate, remaindermen may sue to have their rights adjudicated where adverse claims are being asserted against them.[22] A trespass on the rights of the life tenant gives the remainderman no right to equitable relief,[23] unless the trespass in some way endangers the remainder interest.[24]

Particular equitable remedies. A remainderman may, during the continuance of the preceding estate, protect his interests by relief by injunction;[25] he may, even within that period, maintain a suit to enjoin a sale under a mortgage executed by the life tenant;[26] to restrain the maintenance and operation of an elevated railroad in front of the premises;[27] to quiet, or remove a cloud from, his title,[28] except in certain cases where the remain-

derman's estate is subject to divestiture,[29] although where a purchaser of a life estate at a tax sale sues to quiet title, the remaindermen are not entitled to counter-relief during the life of the life tenant;[30] to reform[31] or set aside[32] a deed to the property; to charge a life tenant's estate for failure to repair;[33] to have a receiver appointed to collect the rents and profits of the land with which to discharge the taxes, and thereby preserve his title in case the life tenant shall fail to pay them for such a time as is liable to forfeit the entire estate;[34] to compel a life tenant with power of sale for benefit of remaindermen to invest proceeds of sale for the remainderman's benefit;[35] and to restrain or enjoin waste[36] pending the contingency.[37] Where timber or other part of the realty is going to loss and imperative need calls for it, equity may cause it to be cut or otherwise secured for the remainderman or reversioner,[38] if it does no harm to the life tenant,[39] or he is compensated.[40] A contingent remainderman born subsequent to the execution of a mortgage may seek relief against the foreclosure of the equity of redemption.[41] Where the property is in the hands of a trustee, any breach of trust or improper conduct on the part of the trustee is a ground for equitable relief,[42] and where a trust deed has been set aside under a decree fraudulently obtained, the remainderman may maintain a bill to have the property restored to the original trust.[43] If the trustee is already under a valid and sufficient bond to protect the remainder interest, the remainderman is not entitled to any other relief;[44] and the remainderman cannot, during the continuance of the life estate, sue on the trustee's bond to recover any part of the amount wasted, although he could proceed in equity to compel the trustee to bring the money into court to be invested.[45] The remainderman may maintain a suit for the appointment of a new trustee and for an accounting.[46]

Suit to quiet title may be maintained by the holder of the legal title against contingent remaindermen whose remainder is a mere expectancy.[47]

Statutory provisions. Statutes authorizing a remainderman, either vested or contingent, to maintain an action against any person claiming any interest in the property, to determine the interests of the parties therein, have been construed and applied,[48] as has a statute to the effect that a remainderman, notwithstanding the intervening estate,

There is no duty on the remainderman to bring such suit, apart from circumstances requiring action to escape the charge of laches.—Ward v. Chambless, 189 So. 890, 238 Ala. 165—Teal v. Mixon, 169 So. 477, 233 Ala. 23.

Contingent remainder

(1) Although the right of future enjoyment of remaindermen may be contingent on their surviving life tenant, such right may be adjudicated in a suit to quiet title.—Audsley v. Hale, 261 S.W. 117, 303 Mo. 451.

(2) Contingent remainderman is held entitled to have title quieted in him as against the claim of another contingent remainderman, notwithstanding the intervening life estate still continued.—Boggess v. Crail, 5 S.W.2d 906, 224 Ky. 97.

(3) An action may be maintained by a remainderman for the protection of a contingent remainder, as against one who claims an estate or interest in the property adverse to such remainderman.—Wilson v. Linder, 110 P. 274, 18 Idaho 438, 138 Am.S.R. 213.

(4) However, grantees of contingent remainder subject to life estate may not maintain action to quiet title subject to life estate, but decree may only declare them contingent remaindermen.—Elvers-

§ 99. Limitation and Laches

a. General rules; extinguishment of particular estate
b. Laches

a. General Rules; Extinguishment of Particular Estate

The general rule is that the statute of limitations does not begin to run against a remainderman until the termination of the preceding particular estate, as by the death of the life tenant, since he is not entitled to the possession until such termination; but the rule does not apply to actions which are available to him during the continuance of the preceding estate, as where his possession is not involved, and in such cases the statute begins to run immediately on the accrual of the cause of action, even though the preceding estate has not terminated.

With respect to actions by a remainderman arising out of, and by virtue of, his estate in remainder, the general rule is that, since, as appears in § 85 supra, a remainderman is not entitled to the possession of the premises during the continuance of the preceding particular estate, the statute of limitations does not start to run against him until that estate has terminated, as by the death of the life tenant;[51] and as appears in § 66 supra, possession does not ordinarily become adverse as against the remainderman until such termination. It has been held that limitation will not run against a remainderman in favor of the life tenant.[52]

The general rule above stated does not apply where some special equity intervenes to put the onus of action on the remainderman.[53] Actions which are available to a remainderman during the continuance of the precedent estate, whether by statute or otherwise, are not within the general rule above stated, and the statute begins to run in such cases immediately on the accrual of the cause of action, even though the preceding particular estate has not terminated;[54] and the same exception applies where the life tenant has abandoned the claim of life tenancy and is claiming under a different title, with the remainderman's knowledge,[55] and where the claim could have been asserted by another in the remainderman's behalf,[56] and it applies to remaindermen who are entitled to possession before dower is assigned,[57] to actions which do not affect the remainderman's possession, but affect his title,[58] and to possessory actions accrues which is capable of legal assertion, . . . [the remainderman's] rights are unaffected."—In re Shelley's Estate, 134 A. 468, 471, 287 Pa. 105, modification refused 135 A. 740, 288 Pa. 11.

Basis and limitation of rule

"The general rule is that laches, estoppel, nor the statute of limitations will run against a remainderman prior to the termination of the life tenancy. This rule is, however, predicated on an uninterrupted continuation of the conduct of the life tenant consistent with his duty as such to the remaindermen. The rule may not apply where it is shown that the remainderman had actual knowledge of the repudiation or abandonment by the life tenant of his status as such, and of the holding by him of the property under a different and adverse right, or where the life tenant, in good faith and to the knowledge of the remainderman, claims title, not as a life tenant, but through some other source, or where there has been ouster and disseisin of the life tenant or by one claiming by, through or under him, and this under claim of right or color of title followed by adverse possession for the statutory period, or when there is some special independent equity in favor of the purchaser who claims under a conveyance from the life tenant."—Mullan v. Bank of Pasco County, 133 So. 823, 829, 101 Fla. 1097—Commercial Bldg. Co. v. Parslow, 112 So. 378, 381, 93 Fla. 143.

Right of action in life tenant or tenant in common does not set limitation in motion against a remainderman during the term of the life estate.—Hensley v. Conway, Tex.Civ. App., 29 S.W.2d 416.

Effect of conveyance by life tenant

"A remainderman [will not] be relieved of his disability because the life tenant has attempted to convey and his grantee claims the fee under this transfer."—Willis v. Robinson, 237 S.W. 1030, 1034, 1035, 291 Mo. 650.

Death of second life tenant

"The interest of the life tenants being undivided and severable only by judicial action, which did not occur, the statute did not begin to run against the remaindermen until the death of [the second life tenant]."—Willis v. Robinson, supra.

Tax deed

(1) Recording of a tax deed does not start the statute of limitations against the remainderman while the life tenant is in possession.—Wicoff v. Moore, Mo., 257 S.W. 474.

(2) One entering under a void tax sale is a mere trespasser, so that the statute of limitations cannot be put in operation against remaindermen before the expiration of the life estate merely because of entry under the tax deed; and no forfeiture of a life estate results from a void sale for taxes so as to set the statute in motion against remaindermen before such expiration.—Champion v. Williams, 264 S.W. 972, 165 Ark. 328.

Action for appropriation of proceeds of sale

Since remaindermen had no interest in proceeds of sale of property except its preservation until death of one entitled to income for life, they were not obliged to take any action, where trustee appropriated funds, until within period of limitations reckoning from such death, and nothing could be presumed against them because they did not take any action against such trustee before such death.—Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland v. State, to use of Grah, 165 A. 176, 164 Md. 304.

"If . . . the apparent life tenant acquires some color of title incompatible with the existence of a life estate and a remainder estate, even though by a void act or instrument, and takes and holds possession thereunder and not as life tenant, and the remainderman knows of such entry holding and possession and of the nature thereof, a cause of action then accrues to the remainderman, and if he takes no steps then, or within the statutory period, he must suffer the consequences. The reason underlying this is the apparent life tenant has relinquished and repudiated that claim, the remainderman then has a cause of action to obtain possession, the life estate is no more, and if the remainderman does not act he may lose his estate by an adverse possession."—Superior Oil Corporation v. Alcorn, supra.

where the entire estate is granted to a trustee who holds the legal title in fee for the benefit of both the particular estate and the estate in remainder, where if the trustee's right of action is barred the cestuis qui trust in remainder are barred also.[59] To prevent the running of the statute until the life tenant's death, the remainderman has been required to establish that he owned the remainder in fee.[60] The failure of a remainderman to enter or otherwise enforce a forfeiture incurred by a preceding life tenant until the right to do so is barred merely confirms the existing life estate and does not affect his subsequently accruing right on the death of the life tenant;[61] and the same rule applies in cases where the life tenant refuses to accept his devise.[62]

Some courts have not applied the general rule where the possessor is a stranger to the title of both the life tenant and the remainderman;[63] but the correctness of this view has been questioned.[64]

Where there is a merger of the particular estate and the remainder, as discussed in § 93 supra, the right of action of the remainderman accrues at once and the statute of limitations begins to run against the one in possession,[65] even though the deed from the life tenant to the remainderman is fraudulent as to a creditor of the life tenant.[66] A conveyance by the life tenant to one remainderman who conveys to a third person does not extinguish the life estate so as to start the running of limitations against the other remainderman.[67] Where land is partitioned among several life tenants who thereafter occupy the different parts in severalty, the statute of limitations as to each tract begins to run from the death of the life tenant to whom the particular tract was allotted, and is not postponed until the death of the last surviving life tenant.[68] A remainderman who was not a party to an action of ejectment brought by a landlord against the life tenant to recover possession of property for the nonpayment of rent is not within the provision of the statute limiting the tenant's right to redeem by paying the rent in arrears to six months after the landlord has been placed in possession.[69] Where a person acquires possession under contracts with the remaindermen and claims adversely to all the world, the statute begins to run against the right of the remaindermen to recover the land from the date of their respective contracts.[70]

When the remainder estate is conveyed, even by a void instrument, the statute of limitation based on the grantee's adverse possession is immediately put in operation.[71]

When the remainderman's interest is adversely held, he must sue within the time allowed by the statute of limitations to vindicate his right and establish the character of his interest;[72] and the statute does not begin to run against him until knowledge is clearly brought home to him that another is claiming his title adversely.[73]

In an action against a remainderman based on a cause arising on the termination of the preceding estate, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until such termination.[74]

Accounting. In an action by a remainderman against a life tenant for a general accounting, it was held that there was no applicable statute of limitations.[75]

b. Laches

While there are circumstances in which a remainderman may be guilty of laches, he is not guilty thereof in failing to assert his claim before his right to the possession accrues by the termination of the preceding estate, except as to actions available to him before such termination.

While it has been broadly stated that there are circumstances requiring a remainderman to act pending the particular estate in order to escape the charge of laches,[76] the general rule is that, except as to actions available to him before the termination of the preceding estate,[77] a remainderman is not guilty of laches in failing to assert his claim before his right to the possession of the property accrues by the termination of the preceding estate;[78] nor is there laches in his failure to assert it until any disability from which he may be suffering is removed.[79] A remainderman who commences suit within the period allowed by law is not guilty of laches even though he might have commenced it at once on the termination of the preceding estate.[80]

Where the remainderman has a present beneficial interest in addition to his interest in remainder, a bill to set aside a deed executed by a trustee of the estate will be barred where there has been an unreasonable delay on the part of the remainderman in asserting his claim to the property.[81] Where a life tenant wrongfully conveys land in fee, the remainderman's rights are not barred by failure to bring action to quiet title within the statutory time;[82] but a remainderman may be estopped by long delay to repudiate a sale by the life tenant,[83] or to set aside a conveyance divesting his interest,[84] or to repudiate a transaction whereby, through

Where records and chain of title when taken alone, in fact pass entire fee and the only matter which will create a different result is collateral, as distinguished from situation where chain of title shows that life tenant undertaking to convey the remainder has only a life estate, persons claiming remainder must immediately assert their rights or they will be guilty of laches.—Ussery v. fraud or deceit, he is induced to part with his remainder pending the life estate.[85]

The propriety and necessity of joining particular persons, such as remaindermen and life tenants, as parties in actions involving remainder interests have been variously determined.

The life tenant is a necessary party to a suit by remaindermen to forfeit the life estate for waste,[86] and to a contingent remainderman's action to recover the value of timber removed from the land;[87] but he need not be made a party to an action by remaindermen for permanent damage to the inheritance,[88] and life tenants who convey their estates back to a decedent before his death are not necessary parties to an action to divest the title of infant heirs, since they have no interest in the land.[89] In an action by a remainderman, after the termination of the preceding estate, to recover his remainder interest in the hands of an adverse claimant, neither the personal representative of the testator or grantor of the remainder,[90] nor the personal representative of the tenant of the particular estate,[91] nor an attorney to whom a remainderman has quitclaimed a half interest in the land to secure fees in prosecuting an ejectment suit,[92] is a necessary party. To a remainderman's bill to avoid the sale of lands, and reclaim them, the original and intermediate grantees in warranty deeds are proper, but not necessary, parties.[93]

Although it has been held that the holder of a particular estate is to be treated as the representative of the contingent remaindermen in a proceeding to charge an expense on the corpus of an estate,[94] it is the general rule that the right of contingent remaindermen constitutes an estate in land of which they cannot be divested during the existence of the life estate except by appropriate legal proceedings to which they are made parties;[95] and in particular circumstances it has been held that contingent remaindermen should be made parties to an action for permanent injuries to the land,[96] or to recover the value of timber removed therefrom.[97] Where contingent remaindermen are necessary parties to a proceeding to sell land for reinvestment, they may join as plaintiffs,[98] and when they do so it is not necessary to make them defendants.[99] Contingent remaindermen suing for permanent injury to the property represent, under the doctrine of virtual representation, those who will ultimately come into the entire estate, such undetermined parties being in privity with them;[1] and children of vested remaindermen who died during the life estate cannot attack a sale of property for purpose of reinvestment, although they were not made parties.[2]

A life tenant not in possession of property covered by a void deed cannot be joined as a coplaintiff with the remaindermen in a bill against the grantee in possession to declare the deed void;[3] and it has been held that where a tort on realty affects both the life tenant's and the remainderman's estates, each may sue separately, but they cannot unite in an action to recover damages for the injury,[4] although other authority is to the contrary.[5] Several remaindermen may maintain a joint action against a personal representative of a preceding life tenant to recover rents collected by him which accrued after the termination of the life estate.[6]

§ 101. Pleadings

Requirements for pleadings in several types of action involving remainder interests have been stated, and the sufficiency of particular pleadings determined.

In an action to recover a remainder interest although it may be necessary to show the death of the precedent life tenant,[7] it is not necessary to aver a grant of administration on the estate of the testator.[8] In a suit in equity to protect the remainder from loss or injury, every fact essential to the relief which plaintiff seeks must be averred in the bill, and no relief can be granted for matters not alleged, although they may appear from other parts of the pleadings and evidence.[9] In an action to sell land for the purpose of defeating contingent remainders, the petition must show an explanation of the title and the intent to defeat such remainders.[10] A complaint alleging wrongful entry and the removal of trees sufficiently charges defendants with conversion as trespassers, excluding any inference that defendants with consent of life tenant cut only so much timber as he was entitled to use for fuel and repairs to fences and buildings.[11] In particular cases, a petition by a remainderman to recover land and compel the purchasers at a foreclosure sale against the life tenant to account for rents was held to set out a cause of action,[12] as were a petition in an action to recover damages for voluntary waste[13] and a petition by remaindermen to enjoin the taking of coal for commercial purposes by life tenants and their grantees;[14] a bill by coremaindermen for partition and to cancel clouds on title was held not demurrable as showing affirmatively that adverse possession began within a few days after the life tenant's death;[15] a petition by one who had a contingent remainder or no interest was held not to allege such title as would authorize an action to forfeit the property on the ground of waste;[16] and the object of a bill by contingent remaindermen was held to be the preservation of the principal of the estate.[17]

Misnomer. In an action by a remainderman for an injury to his estate, the fact that it is misnamed as a reversion instead of a remainder is immaterial.[18]

§ 102. Evidence

A remainderman, in an action to protect his interests or enforce his rights, has the burden of proving the essential elements of his cause of action. The admissibility and sufficiency of evidence has been adjudged in several cases involving remaindermen.

A remainderman seeking to set aside a deed by the life tenant, or to compel a reconveyance, has the burden of proving the fraud alleged,[19] as he has where he alleges fraud and conspiracy between the life tenant and one purchasing the tax title to have the property sold for taxes.[20]

On a writ of entry by a remainderman, the entry of the remainderman or some person for him or holding under him must be proved;[21] and in an action of ejectment the burden of proof rests on plaintiffs to show that the preceding life tenant was dead at the time the action was commenced.[22] Where the wife of a life tenant secured a tax deed to the premises on the life tenant's failure to pay the taxes, the burden, in an action by the remaindermen to set aside the tax proceeding, is on those claiming through the tax title to establish that it was acquired by the wife in good faith.[23] In an action to charge land purchased by a life tenant in favor of the remaindermen, the evidence must show that funds of the estate were used in the purchase.[24] A grantee, suing as remainderman to declare and foreclose a lien, for taxes paid by him, on the alleged life tenant's interest must prove that defendant is a life tenant.[25]

On the other hand, on an accounting between remaindermen, no burden rests on one claiming for taxes paid by him to show that payments were not made out of a common family purse.[26]

In an action of trover against a purchaser from the life tenant, proof of a demand and refusal is not only evidence of a conversion at the time of the demand, but it authorizes a jury to presume a conversion from the time the remainderman's right to possession accrued.[27] Since an action by a remainderman to redeem his interest after a life tenant has by default in a suit for nonpayment of rent forfeited it to the landlord is one for equitable relief and does not sound in tort, recovery can be sustained therein without any proof of fraud.[28]

The admissibility[29] and sufficiency[30] of evidence has been adjudged in several cases involving remaindermen.

§ 103. Damages

Damage to a remainder is ascertained by apportioning the damage to the fee between the life tenant and the remainderman, according to the annuity tables.

The remainderman can recover only for the injury done to the estate in remainder and not for any injury to the preceding estate;[31] and the damage to the remainder is ascertained by taking the damage to the fee and apportioning it between the life tenant and the remainderman, according to the annuity tables.[32] In ejectment by remaindermen against one claiming under the life tenant, the jury cannot assess damages beyond the date of the death of the life tenant.[33]

§ 104. Trial and Judgment

In a remainderman's action, no relief will be granted on an allegation to support which no evidence was offered; and a decree of sale of a remainder is beyond the court's jurisdiction in an action where the pleadings do not involve the remaindermen's interest. The propriety of particular instructions, and of costs, has been adjudicated in actions involving remainder interests.

Instruction. In an action by remaindermen to declare a trust in land acquired by the life tenant from the purchaser at a sale under a mortgage given by the life tenant, a particular instruction given as to the purchaser's bidding in the property in behalf of the life tenant, and the refusal of a requested instruction, were held proper.[34]

Relief. In a remainderman's action against a life tenant, no relief will be granted on an allegation in support of which no evidence was offered.[35]

Decree. Where the scope of the pleadings in an action does not involve the interest of remaindermen, a decree of sale of the remainder is beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and a nullity.[36] A contingent remainderman who, while not obligated to do so, brings suit, before his estate vests, for the protection of the principal of the estate is bound, after his estate becomes vested, by the decree therein rendered.[37]

In suit to establish grandchildren's interests under deed granting deceased grandmother life estate, with remainder over to her children, ruling out as a whole evidence that plaintiffs were only lineal heirs of their father, grandmother's son, and as to date of father's death, and that plaintiffs never received any part of grandmother's estate, was error.—Ward v. Ward, 169 S.E. 120, 176 Ga. 849.

Evidence held inadmissible

In remaindermen's action for damages to land caused by construction of gas pipe line, defendant's agent was properly not allowed to testify that life tenant authorizing construction advised agent that life tenant was owner, since one cannot acquire interest in land of another by contract with one who represents himself to be true owner but who in fact is not owner.—Warfield Natural Gas Co. v. Ward, 72 S.W.2d 464, 254 Ky. 754.

30. Evidence held sufficient

(1) In suit by a remainderman to set aside a deed by the life tenant, or to compel a reconveyance, evidence showed that the dwelling conveyed was sold for about as much as it was possible to get for it at the time.—Ballinger v. Bartolett, 127 A. 671, 3 N.J.Misc. 80.

(2) In action to recover minor remaindermen's portion of land from life tenant's grantees, evidence was sufficient to sustain a finding for plaintiffs.—Abernathy v. McCoy, 154 N.E. 682, 91 Ind.App. 574.

(3) In an action in ejectment by the husband of a deceased remainderman, a finding that the life tenant did not intend to give up permanently possession to the remainderman, so as to merge the life estate in the remainder, was warranted under the evidence.—McCullough v. Carpenter, Mo., 225 S.W. 674.

(4) Evidence in quiet title action sustained finding that conditions imposed on grantee by her mother's will were fulfilled with money borrowed on deed of trust, which debt was a primary obligation on the land and not in effect a personal debt of grantee's husband who purchased property on foreclosure, and deed of trust became outstanding encumbrance for which grantee's children as remaindermen were proportionately liable.—Souders v. Kitchens, 137 S.W.2d 501, 345 Mo. 977.

(5) In action of ejectment by purchaser of remainder, evidence that school district built thereon a building which, with surrounding ground, was used only as public school until district sold lot to defendants, was sufficient to support jury's finding that district's possession of lot was adverse and its claim of ownership thereof, supported by face of its record title and character of its occupancy for statutory period, warranted verdict for defendants.—Ontelaunee Orchards v. Rothermel, 11 A. 2d 543, 139 Pa.Super. 44.

Evidence held insufficient

(1) To establish conspiracy, intentional fraud, or undue influence, in a remainderman's suit to set aside a deed by a life tenant, or to compel a reconveyance.—Ballinger v. Bartolett, 127 A. 671, 3 N.J.Misc. 80.

(2) To establish fraudulent conspiracy between the life tenant and the purchaser of the land at a tax sale, in a remainderman's suit to recover an interest in land sold for taxes.—Harris v. Evans, 195 N.W. 178, 196 Iowa 799.

Costs. On the dismissal of a remainderman's bill to set aside the life tenant's deed for inadequacy of price, costs have been denied because of defendant grantee's lack of frankness in testifying.[38]

VI. REVERSIONS

§ 105. Definitions and Distinctions

a. In general
b. Possibility of reverter

a. In General

An estate in reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him.

An estate in reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of some particular estate granted out by him.[39] The term "reversion" has two meanings: First, as designating the estate left in the grantor during the continuance of a particular estate. Second, the returning of the land to the grantor or his heirs after the grant is over.[40] The word "reverter" is sometimes loosely used to denote what is properly styled "possibility of reverter" which is considered infra subdivision b of this section. In deeds or wills the term "revert" or "reversion" is sometimes loosely used to describe an interest differing from a technical reversion.[41] A reversion does not become a remainder because it is so called in the instrument creating it.[42]

b. Possibility of Reverter

A possibility of reverter, as distinguished from a reversion, arises on a grant so limited that it may last forever or may terminate on a contingency; it is the possibility of having the fee again which exists in a grantor after the grant of a determinable or qualified fee.

A reversion should be distinguished from a possibility of reverter which, according to modern technical notions, arises on a grant so limited that it may last forever or may terminate on a contingency; it is the possibility of having the fee again which exists in a grantor after the grant of a determinable or qualified fee,[43] and determinable fees

Contingent remainder limited by devise
If a contingent remainder in fee be limited by devise, there remains a reversion in the heirs of the devisor until the contingency happens. —Osgood v. Thomas, 121 A. 122, 45 R.I. 189.

Right of re-entry
A right of reëntry for nonpayment of rent or nonperformance of any other condition is not a reversion or possibility of reversion. It is not an estate in the land, but a right of action, and if enforced the person entering would be in by a forfeiture of condition, and not by a reverter. Where lands are leased in fee, therefore, whatever conditions the lease may contain, the lessor has no reversion or possibility of reversion which can entitle him to impose restraints on the power of alienation of the lessee.—De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 467, 57 Am.D. 470—21 C.J. p 938 note 27 b (2).

"Revert" means to return or turn back, and its legal or technical signification is for property to return or go back to a person who formerly owned it, but who parted with the possession or title to it by creating an estate in another; it applies to personal as well as to real property. —Bynum v. A condition subsequent reserved by grantor in deed, creating a possibility of reëntry on breach by sale of liquors on the premises, is not an "estate" in grantor, but merely and consequently possibilities of reverter have been frequently recognized in the United States.[44] A possibility of reverter is, at common law, not an estate;[45] it is inalienable,[46] not assignable, see Assignments § 13, nor devisable, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 85, also 68 C.J. p 499 note 1, although it may be made so by statute;[47] but, as stated in Descent and Distribution § 18, it is descendible, and may be released to him in possession,[48] and has been held capable of transmission by the grantor to his grantee and will pass to the latter under a conveyance of the reversion.[49] Until the contingency happens the whole title is in the grantee.[50] It has been held that this possibility is not subject to merger by the union of the possibility of reverter with the fee conditional in the heir at law.[51] A sale of the grantee's interest in property in which he has a qualified fee does not affect the grantor's right to have the property under his possibility of reverter when the fee has terminated.[52] The holder of a bare possibility of reverter cannot maintain an action for an injury to the property.[53]

§ 106. Characteristics

A reversion is a present vested interest or estate, and it arises by construction and operation of law whenever a grantor has conveyed less than his whole interest or estate, the undisposed portion being his when the grant is terminated. It is not within the rule against perpetuities.

Although at common law, as the necessary sequence of feudal tenures, the freehold could not be in abeyance, the doctrine of nonabeyance did not apply to reversions, for the reason that they were consistent with the fee, always being vested, or an intermediate estate of freehold being in some third person against whom an action might be brought for recovery of the property.[54] The grant by a tenant in fee of a term for years in no way affects the seizin of the grantor, whose interest is then freehold in possession subject to the term.[55] When, however, the particular estate is an estate of freehold the particular tenant and not the reversioner has the seizin, and the reversioner has a reversion of freehold expectant on the estate granted, and with less propriety he is said to be "seized of a reversion on a freehold estate."[56] A reversion is a present vested interest or estate, inasmuch as the person entitled to it has a fixed right of possession and profit in futuro,[57] and necessarily assumes that a possibility of the grantor's coming into an estate in the future.—Union Colony Co. of Colorado v. Gallie, 88 P.2d 120, 104 Colo. 46.

the original owner has not parted with his whole estate or interest in the land.[58] A reversion, being a vested right, is not, as stated in the C.J.S. title Perpetuities § 12, also 48 C.J. p 955 note 18, within the rule against perpetuities. It has been said that a reversion is never created like a remainder by deed or writing or other act of the grantor who creates it at the very time when the particular estate is created, but arises by construction and operation of law wherever a grantor has conveyed less than his whole interest or estate, the undisposed portion being his when the grant is terminated.[59] The particular estate which precedes a reversion may be a lease for years created by a life tenant.[60] At common law, if a remainder was limited to the heirs of the grantor, it took effect as a reversion.[61] By reason of the radical change in the law of descent and statutes rendering all of a decedent's real estate subject to sale for his debts, the heir is in the same position whether he takes by descent as the heir of the reversioner or under his will as a remainderman.[62]

§ 107. Rights and Liabilities of Reversioner

A reversioner has no right of possession during the continuance of the preceding estate, but is entitled to immediate possession of the premises on termination of such estate. He has the right to redeem from a mortgage. The right of the reversioner to rents depends on the terms of the grant.

A reversioner has no right of possession during the continuance of the preceding estate[63] and is liable for trespass on the land in the same manner as any other person;[64] but where there is a suit pending between the reversioner and another concerning a question of waste or improvements he has a right to go upon the premises in a peaceable manner, with his witnesses, for the purpose of examining the same.[65] On the termination of the particular estate the reversioner is entitled to the immediate possession of the premises, notwithstanding any lease previously executed by the preceding tenant.[66] If the owner of a precedent life estate is disseized, the reversioner is not obliged to enter at once, but has a new right of entry on the death of the life tenant.[67] A reversioner cannot, during the continuance of a life estate, authorize the cutting of timber on the estate.[68] A reversioner is entitled to the benefit of any increase in value in the property before the termination of the preceding estate.[69] A grantor of a right of way at a bridge, with a reservation that when the right of way be no longer used as a road it revert to him, is not entitled to take charge of the bridge when use as a right of way is discontinued.[70]

A reversioner has the right to redeem from a mortgage;[71] and it has been held that reversioner redeeming from a mortgage may oust the life tenant unless the life tenant redeems him.[72]

Rent is a separable incident of the reversion, since it may be severed from the reversion.[73] The rent may be granted away, reserving the reversion,[74] or the reversion may be granted away reserving the rent by special words.[75] By a general grant of the reversion the rent will pass with it as an incident to it,[76] and the rule is the same where the assignment of the reversion is by mortgage instead of by an absolute conveyance;[77] but a general grant of the rent will not pass the reversion.[78] It is not necessary that the rent should be payable in money for it to be incident to the reversion.[79] The devisee of a reversionary interest is entitled to the rents as an incident thereto.[80] Rent which is due and in arrears at the time of the assignment of the reversion does not pass as an incident thereto.[81] Where land is granted to a railroad for a right of way for the term of years of its incorporation, and the road or its successor elects to continue its use after the expiration of the time limited by the grant, the owner of the estate in reversion is entitled to compensation at such time.[82]

§ 108. Transfer

A reversion is devisable, descendible, and alienable inter vivos. A grant of the reversion passes all the rights of the grantor.

A reversion is devisable, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 85, also 68 C.J. p 498 note 86, descendible, see Descent and Distribution § 18, and alienable inter vivos,[83] whether the reversion is subject to a mere term of years, or is expectant on a freehold estate.[84] A grant of the reversion passes all rights reserved to the grantor in the grant of the preceding particular estate,[85] including the right of reentry.[86] A reversioner entitled to reënter on breach of a condition subsequent cannot reënter after conveyance of his reversionary interest,[87] and, where the grantee of a reversion expectant on breach of a condition subsequent has the same right of entry as the original reversioner, the grantee of a reversion has no right of entry for a breach of condition occurring prior to the conveyance of the reversion.[88] As stated supra § 107, in the case of a reversion subject to a term a grant of the reversion carries to the grantee the rent to accrue on the lease. The attornment of the tenant of the particular estate was formerly necessary to perfect such a conveyance by grant, whether the particular estate was in tail, for life, or for years, but this necessity has been abolished by statute.[89] A conveyance by a reversioner immediately after becoming of age will not be set aside for mere inadequacy of price, where no fraud or imposition on the part of the purchaser is shown and there is no confidential relation between the parties.[90] One holding real estate in trust for others during their life, with a reversion to himself after their death, and procuring insurance thereon in his name as trustee to an amount not shown to exceed the value of the life interest, may hold the money received by him on such insurance, after a loss by fire, as trustee, since he is not liable to be attached by his private creditors.[91] As stated supra § 106, at common law if a remainder was limited to the heirs of the grantor it took effect as a reversion and it would be competent for the grantor as being himself the reversioner after making such a limitation to grant away the reversion.[92] Where a lease in fact creates a life tenancy, a purchaser of the land incorrectly informed by the tenant as to the nature of his tenancy is a purchaser in good faith without notice of the claim of a life tenancy.[93]

§ 109. Extinction

The right to a reversion may be extinguished by adverse possession or limitations.

Ordinarily possession is not adverse to the reversioner during the continuance of the particular estate.[94] Although a disseizin of the life tenant of the particular estate gives the reversioner an immediate right of entry if he chooses, it does not affect the rule regarding the extinction of a reversion by adverse possession and the running of the statute of limitations.[95] If the person in possession does not claim under the tenant of the particular estate, but under contracts with the reversioners, the statute of limitation begins to run against the right of the reversioners to recover the land from the date of their respective contracts, and is not postponed until the death of the life tenant.[96]

§ 110. Merger

A reversion may be extinguished by merger.

A reversion may by act of law cease to exist as a separate estate by merger, which takes place where the particular estate and the immediate reversion meet in the same person and in the same right.[97] What constitutes a merger is considered infra §§ 123–131.

§ 111. Actions

A reversioner may, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain an action at law for injury done to the inheritance. He may sue in equity to prevent a threatened injury to his rights, or to establish his claim.

A reversioner may, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain an action for any injury done to the inheritance,[98] but not for an injury which affects only the preceding estate and not the reversionary interest.[99] Where an injury is done to the estate both of the life tenant and the reversioner the latter can recover for the injury done to his estate but not for the entire injury to both estates.[1] That the injury is also an injury to the tenant of the preceding estate does not affect the reversioner's right of action;[2] nor does the fact that there is an intermediate life estate prevent the reversioner from maintaining an action against the tenant in possession for an injury to the inheritance.[3] A possibility that the cause of the injury may be removed before the termination of the particular estate does not affect the reversioner's right of action,[4] and the fact that it is the duty of the life tenant to protect the inheritance and that he might sue for an act of waste committed by a third person does not affect the reversioner's right of action for such injury.[5]

In equity. A reversioner may maintain a suit in equity to prevent a threatened injury to his rights,[6] or to establish his claim, and to be placed in a condition to make it available whenever he shall become entitled to the possession of the estate,[7] but a bill in equity is not necessary to reach a reversion of land in which another person has held a life estate which has run out.[8]

§ 112. Limitations and Laches

In general a reversioner's right of entry must have accrued before the statute of limitations will begin to run against him, or before laches may be imputed to him.

The statute does not begin to run until the termination of the estate on which the reversion is expectant, which gives the reversioner a right of entry;[9] nor, generally, can any laches in asserting his claim to the property be imputed to him until after his right of entry accrues.[10] However, in a proper case a reversioner's title may be destroyed by laches during the lifetime of the owner of the particular estate.[11]

§ 113. Form of Remedy

The rights of a reversioner may be enforced by any appropriate remedy. Case is a proper form of proceeding for an injury to an interest in reversion.

On the termination of the particular estate, the reversioner or his legal representatives may enforce his rights by any appropriate available action or suit.[12] An action of case is the proper form of proceeding for an injury to an interest in reversion.[13] An action of trespass cannot be maintained by a reversioner who is not in possession of the premises,[14] unless authorized by statute.[15] A statute authorizing an action of trespass by a reversioner against a stranger does not authorize such an action where the act complained of was done under the authority, or by the permission, of the tenant in possession.[16] A third person cannot complain of the methods used by the reversioner in enforcing a forfeiture of the particular estate and in making reentry.[17] As stated in the C.J.S. title Partition § 58, also 47 C.J. p 341 note 23 et seq, where there are several reversioners they will be entitled to partition, and in some jurisdictions partition may be had during the continuance of the particular estate.

§ 114. Parties

The rules applicable to parties generally apply in actions or suits by reversioners.

In an action by a reversioner for an injury done to the inheritance it is not necessary for the owner of the preceding particular estate to be made a party.[18] One of two reversioners may maintain an action for an injury to the inheritance without joining the other, unless the nonjoinder is pleaded in abatement; and, under the general issue, evidence of such nonjoinder will not defeat the action, but will merely restrict plaintiff to the recovery of a moiety of the damage.[19] The heirs of a devisee of an estate in fee on condition restraining alienation for a certain period cannot recover the estate from the purchaser in breach of such condition, since the proper parties are the heirs of testator to whom the estate reverts.[20] Since, as stated supra § 105 b, the holder of a bare possibility of reverter cannot maintain an action for an injury to the property, he may not join as a party plaintiff in such an action.

§ 115. Pleadings

In actions or suits by reversioners the declaration, petition or complaint must state all matters necessary to support the cause of action.

The declaration must either state an injury of such a permanent nature as to be necessarily injurious to the reversion, or must explicitly allege that it was done to the injury of the reversion.[21] The declaration should not be argumentative nor should it contain a statement of the proof.[22] It is sufficient if it sets up an injury of such a permanent nature as to be necessarily injurious to the reversion,[23] but a mere allegation of injury to the reversion, without facts showing an injury of this character, is insufficient.[24]

§ 116. Evidence

The burden is on the reversioner to establish his case by proper evidence of matters material to his right of recovery.

Since in general the reversioner may sue only for an injury to the inheritance, the evidence must be confined strictly to the damage done to the inheritance,[25] and the proof must establish that the injury complained of is prejudicial to the reversionary interest and not merely to the estate in possession.[26] The burden of proof is on the reversioner to show the date of the death of a life tenant, on which event his right to rents accrued;[27] and this burden not being met there can be no decree in his favor for the rents.[28]

§ 117. Trial and Judgment

Actions by reversioners are governed by the general rules applicable in civil actions as to trial, discussed in the C.J.S. title Trial § 1 et seq, also 64 C.J. p 31 note 2 et seq, and judgments, considered in the C.J.S. title Judgments § 1 et seq, also 33 C.J. p 1047 note 1 et seq. § 118. Damages

The reversioner is limited to recovery of damages to the inheritance only.

The reversioner can recover damages only for the injury done to the inheritance and not for any injury to the preceding estate.[29] He is not entitled to recover damages for a diminution in the value of property where he has been allowed damages for making repairs and for loss of rentals.[30] In an action for wrongfully mining and removing coal from the land he may recover, not only the value of the coal taken, but also compensation for any damage done to the land or to the coal left in the mine.[31] The measure of damages as to the coal removed is the value of the coal when first severed from its native bed, without deducting the expense of severing it.[32]

VII. EXECUTORY INTERESTS

§ 119. Origin and History

Under the rules of the common law a legal estate could not be limited after a fee, or conveyed in futuro, or suspended. Under the system of uses, however, chancery enforced such estates, until the statute of uses transmuted the use into a legal estate, and, with the enactment of the statute of wills, legal estates could thereafter be conveyed or devised without the narrow limitations the common law technicalities required in the creation of remainders. Thus arose that class of estates known as executory interests.

As appears supra § 20, conditional limitations or executory interests had no existence at common law, and arose only out of conveyances or devises having operation under the statute of uses. A remainder or other legal estate could not be limited after a fee,[33] nor could a freehold be conveyed in futuro by a common-law conveyance;[34] and title to property could not be suspended, but was required to be vested in someone,[35] although it could be cut off or defeated.[36] Whatever the origin of uses, whether derived by the ecclesiastical chancellors from the Roman fidei commissum, or a native English growth, the system of uses was firmly established in England in the fifteenth century, see the C.J.S. title Trusts § 8, also 65 C.J. p 219 notes 13–18. However, as is shown in 21 Corpus Juris, page 1022 note 70–p 1024 note 74, uses were not enforced in the courts of law, and a feoffment to one to the use of another was enforceable in chancery alone. In the courts of law the feoffee to uses was considered as the legal owner and the cestui que use was recognized, if at all, as a mere tenant at sufferance. In chancery the cestui que use was recognized as the real owner, and by the writ of subpoena the feoffee to uses could be compelled to deal with the estate as the cestui que use should direct. This equitable estate of the cestui que use was free from the technical rules governing the transfer of estates at common law. After a feoffment to uses, the use of a freehold estate might be transferred without livery of seizin, and a feoffment of land to one to such uses as the feoffer might declare by his will was enforceable.[37] Thus the liberty to devise lands which theretofore did not exist came into being under the system of uses. The abuses of the system led parliament, in 1535, to attempt to abolish all uses, and by the statute of uses, 27 Henry VIII chapter 10, it was declared that the estate of the cestui que use was transferred into a legal estate, so that its owner became complete owner in law as well as in equity.[38] After this statute, under which the use was transmuted into a legal estate, the courts of law assumed jurisdiction of uses;[39] and it was held that an estate created by a deed operating under the statute might be made to commence in futuro without any immediate transmutation of possession, as by a bargain and sale, or a covenant to stand seized to uses,[40] and consequently, by such conveyances, inheritances might be made to shift from one to another on a supervening contingency.[41] Thence arose the doctrine of springing and shifting uses, or conditional limitations.[42] This statute also put a stop to wills of uses, but in 1540, by the Statute of Wills, 32 Henry VIII chapter 1, a general liberty to devise real estate was established. The transfer of lands under these statutes retained many of the doctrines established in the courts of equity before the statutes, and hence arose those "executory limitations" by which future estates in lands may be created without the satisfaction of the technicalities required in the creation of remainders, see supra §§ 68–104; a fee may be limited after, or in derogation of, a prior fee, and an estate may be limited to begin in futuro without the interposition of a precedent estate.[43] Further it is possible to limit a quasi remainder in a chattel real or personalty after a prior life estate therein, see infra §§ 138–139

Construction and effect of statute of uses. Three points established by the courts in the construction of the statute of uses are of the utmost consequence in the doctrine of executory trusts. First the statute executes only one use, see the C.J.S. title Trusts § 176, also 65 C.J. p 519 note 30, so that when a use is limited on a use the second use is void in law,[44] but in process of time the second use was supported in equity as a trust.[45] Second, as the statute requires a person "seized" of the land in order to transfer the legal estate to the cestui que use, the statute does not apply to terms for years[46] or to interests in chattels of which the owner is merely possessed, see the C.J.S. title Trusts § 176, also 65 C.J. p 519 note 31. Third, as appears in the C.J.S. title Trusts § 176, also 65 C.J. p 518 note 24, an active trust is not executed by the statute.

a. Executory limitations and executory interests
b. Conditional limitations
c. Springing use
d. Shifting use
e. Executory devise
f. Contingent use
g. Collateral limitation

a. Executory Limitations and Executory Interests

An executory interest is an ulterior limitation created by either deed or will and which could not be created under the technical rules of the old common law since it may abruptly break off and determine the preceding estate or commence at a period in the future after the precedent estate has determined.

Executory interests are such future estates or interests in realty as could not be created directly by a conveyance at common law, but only by executory devises in wills or by conveyances to uses in deeds.[47] When such interests are created by will they are known as executory devises,[48] and when created by deed they have been designated as conditional limitations,[49] and in either event such an interest is given effect as a shifting or springing use.[50] When the event which gives birth to the ulterior limitation abruptly determines and breaks off the preceding estate, the limitation is executory, inasmuch as it is essential to the constitution of a remainder that it wait for the regular expiration of such estate.[51] Executory devises, see infra § 120 e, shifting uses, see infra § 120 d, and conditional limitations, see infra § 120 b, are essentially the same.[52]

b. Conditional Limitations

A conditional limitation is an estate created by a limitation over to a third person on breach of a condition subsequent, and the term has been considered as a general one which may comprehend executory devises and shifting and springing uses.

If a condition subsequent is followed by a limitation over on a breach of the condition, it is termed a conditional limitation.[53] As appears supra § 20, it is properly a limitation cutting short an estate already granted and substituting another to a third person in its stead, in case a condition be not fulfilled or breached. The term in its broader sense, includes shifting uses and executory devises, and is a phrase limiting an estate previously created and substituting another in its place,[54] and has been considered as a general head or division comprehending every limitation which may vest an interest in a third person, on condition, or on an event which may or may not happen, and to include certain estates in remainder, as well as gifts and grants, which, when made by will, are termed executory

Necessity for delay as distinguishing feature

An estate on condition and a conditional limitation are not the same, although the estate is a conditional one in either case. In the case of a conditional limitation, the estate is determined by the mere happening of the event by which its limitation is measured. An estate on condition, although liable to be defeated, is not in fact determined until he who has the right to avail himself of the condition enters and determines it.—Bean v. Atkins, supra.

devises, and when contained in conveyances to uses, assume the name of springing or shifting uses.[55]

c. Springing Use

A springing use is a use which arises in futuro, either on a contingency or at a certain time, and is independent of, and does not take effect in derogation of, any preceding interest.

As is stated in 21 Corpus Juris page 1023 note 93, a springing use is a use limited to arise in futuro, either on a contingency or at a time certain, which is independent of, and does not take effect in derogation of, any preceding interest. It is a use which arises from the seizin of the grantor, and where there is no estate going before it.[56]

d. Shifting Use

A shifting use is a limitation which takes effect in derogation of some preceding estate previously limited by the same instrument.

A shifting use is a use limited to take effect in derogation of some preceding estate previously limited by the same instrument. Such a use is also called a secondary use.[57]

e. Executory Devise

An executory devise is an executory interest created by will.

An executory devise, as appears in the C.J.S. title Wills § 916, also 69 C.J. p 584 note 50, is such a limitation of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels as the law admits in the case of a will, although contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at common law. Every devise of a future interest which is not preceded by an estate of freehold created by the same will, or which, being so preceded, is limited to take effect before or after, and not at, the expiration of such prior estate of freehold, is an executory devise.[58] Every devise to a person in derogation of, or substitution for, a preceding estate in fee simple is an executory devise.[59] Although the term "executory devise" is used to include as well interests in chattels as in lands, a limitation of a future interest in chattels, which takes effect by the application of a doctrine similar to that of executory devises of lands, is sometimes called with greater exactness an "executory bequest."[60] Executory devises are not ordinarily designated as springing and shifting devises, although these terms are sometimes used as denoting executory devises which take effect in the same manner respectively as springing and shifting uses.

f. Contingent Use

A contingent use is a use such as may by possibility happen in possession, reversion, or remainder.

A contingent use is such a use as may by possibility happen in possession, reversion, or remainder, although there is some authority which states that it is limited to take effect as a remainder.[61]

g. Collateral Limitation

A collateral limitation is a limitation giving an interest for a specified period, but making the right depend on some collateral event.

A collateral limitation is a limitation in the conveyance of an estate, giving an interest for a specified period, but making the right of enjoyment depend on some collateral event.[62] It marks an event which may happen within the time described in the direct limitation, the happening of which puts an end to the estate.[63] It has been distinguished from conditional limitation.[64]

"Conditional" limitation distinguished

If the conveyance gives an interest for a prescribed period, but makes the right to possess or enjoy the thing conveyed to depend upon some collateral event, then the limitation is said to be collateral; but if the estate is expressly so restricted by the instrument creating it that it can not endure after the happening of the contingency upon which the estate or interest, by the terms of the instrument, is to cease, then the limitation is said to be conditional."—Templeman v. Gibbs, supra.

(2) Where the devisor or settlor, without parting with the immediate fee, gives a future estate to rise either on a contingency or at a period certain, unpreceded by, or not having the requisite connection with, any immediate freehold to give it effect as a remainder, considered infra subdivision b (3) of this section. (3) Executory limitations of chattels real and personal, considered infra §§ 138–144.

b. Real Property

(1) After fee
(2) In derogation of life estate
(3) Estates in futuro

(1) After Fee

(a) In general
(b) On failure of issue
(c) Alternative limitations

(a) In General

A limitation after a fee must take effect as an executory limitation. Such a limitation is invalid after an absolute fee simple, but is good after a defeasible fee, at least if created by will, although in some jurisdictions it is invalid if created by deed. The authorities are not agreed as to whether a limitation over in partial derogation of a fee destroys completely the precedent estate.

A limitation after a fee simple must take effect, if at all, as an executory limitation,[66] since, as appears supra § 78, such a limitation cannot take effect at common law as a remainder. There can be no limitation over after an absolute fee simple,[67] but there can be a limitation over of a fee after a defeasible fee simple, on the happening of the event which defeats the first fee.[68] At least a limitation of a fee after a defeasible fee is good by way of executory devise;[69] but there is authority which holds that such a limitation by deed is void,[70] except where authorized by statute.[71] One kind of executory devise exists where an estate is devised to one, but on some future event that estate is determined, and the estate thereupon is to go to another.[72]

Partial derogation of fee. When an executory interest is limited on a contingency in derogation of a preceding fee, it has been held that the fee will be completely destroyed by the vesting of such executory interest, although it is but a life estate;[73] but there is other authority which holds that the fee is divested only so far as is necessary to give effect to such executory interest, and subject thereto remains in the heirs of the prior devisee in fee.[74]

(b) On Failure of Issue

In general a limitation over of an executory interest on a failure of issue is valid unless the period within which the estate may vest violates the rule against perpetuities.

In general a limitation over of an executory interest after an indefinite failure of issue, either in a deed[75] or by way of executory devise in a will,[76] is void; but such a limitation over after a definite failure of issue, if made by way of executory devise in a will, is valid,[77] and in some jurisdictions is valid if made by deed.[78] As appears in the C.J.S. title Wills §§ 852, 917, also 69 C.J. p 476 note 92–p 480 note 6, p 587 note 2–p 588 note 8, a devise after a failure of issue, where the preceding limitation is held to create a fee simple, creates a defeasible fee with an executory devise over, and will take effect or not according as the failure is to happen on a contingency within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities or is on an indefinite failure of issue. In general an executory devise may be limited after an estate tail.[79] If the devise on failure of issue creates an estate tail by implication, considered supra § 24, it has been held that the limitation over will be good where the common law still prevails without regard to whether the failure of issue is definite or indefinite and without regard to the distinction between remainders and executory devises,[80] although there are authorities which are not in harmony with this rule;[81] and there is authority which holds that a devise over, not to take effect until after a general failure of issue, cannot take effect as an executory devise both because it can be supported and have effect as a remainder, expectant on the determination of the estate tail, and also because if an executory devise could be so limited upon an estate tail it might not vest within the time allowed for the vesting of the estate under an executory devise.[82] It has been held that a devise over after an estate tail on a definite failure of issue is not an executory devise, but a remainder.[83] Under statutes which have abolished estates tail, see supra § 29, the validity of such limitations if construed as executory devises will in general depend on whether the limitation is on a definite or indefinite failure of issue.[84] In general a devise which, prior to the time estates tail were abolished, would have created either an express estate tail or an estate tail by implication, with a limitation over, in either case the limitation over being on an indefinite failure of issue, the limitation over on the failure of such issue is an executory devise,[85] which, as appears in the C.J.S. title Perpetuities § 15, also 48 C.J. p 963 note 7–p 964 note 12, is void for remoteness; but if the devise is of an estate of freehold with a limitation over on a definite failure of issue it gives the first taker a defeasible or determinable fee, and the limitation over, if construed as an executory devise, is valid.[86]

(c) Alternative Limitations

A future interest may be limited in the alternative so as to take effect either as an executory limitation or as a contingent remainder.

A future interest may be limited in the alternative so as to take effect either after a fee which is to arise in a certain contingency and which is then to be determinable on a contingency, when the subsequent gift operates as an executory devise; or, in case the fee so limited never vests, the future interest may take effect immediately after the termination of the first estate as a contingent remainder.[87]

(2) In Derogation of Life Estate

A gift to take effect in derogation of a preceding life estate is an executory devise or shifting use.

A gift to take effect in derogation of a preceding life estate is an executory devise or shifting use.[88] If made by deed the gift over is a conditional limitation or a shifting use.[89]

(3) Estates in Futuro

(a) In general
(b) To persons not in esse
(c) Covenant to stand seized and deed of bargain and sale

(a) In General

A freehold to commence in futuro may be made by executory limitation, and includes freeholds limited to arise without any precedent estate, or estates limited after a freehold estate and a further interval of time, or a contingent estate limited after a term for years.

As appears in 21 Corpus Juris page 1025 note 31, at common law a freehold in futuro arises whenever a freehold estate is limited to begin after the expiration of a definite interval of time, or on the happening of a specified event or contingency, other than the natural expiration of a precedent estate of freehold. In consequence of the abeyance of the freehold which would result if an estate so limited were allowed to take effect, a freehold in futuro is void at common law, as appears supra § 77. However, by operation of the statute of uses or statutes authorizing testamentary dispositions a freehold to commence in futuro may be made by executory devise,[90] or by a conveyance of the kind which came into use after the enactment of the statute of uses.[91] These include future freeholds limited to arise either without any precedent estate,[92] or an estate limited after a freehold estate and a further interval of time,[93] or, as is shown in 21 Corpus Juris page 1026 note 42, a contingent estate limited after a term for years.

Under some statutes future estates are classified without respect to their nature, the mode of conveyance by which they are created, and their relation to the estate of the grantor or to other granted estates, and include under that simple classification limitations which at common law were denominated springing and shifting uses and executory devises.[94]

(b) To Persons Not in Esse

An executory interest may be limited to a person not in esse.

A limitation of realty to a person not in esse may be effected by executory devise or by springing use.[95] It seems that even where a devise is so worded as to appear to be an immediate present devise, it will be effectuated if there exists the least circumstance from which to collect the testator's intention that the gift is anything else than an immediate devise to take effect in præsenti.[96]

(c) Covenant to Stand Seized and Deed of Bargain and Sale

A freehold to commence in futuro may be created by a covenant to stand seized or by a deed of bargain and sale.

Under the Statute of Uses, 27 Henry VIII chapter 10, freeholds to begin in futuro may be created by covenant to stand seized,[97] or by deed of bargain and sale,[98] according as the consideration is a consideration of blood or marriage or a valuable consideration.

a. In General

Executory interests are not mere possibilities but are certain interests and estates. They are not destructible as a result of casualties to the precedent estate. A conditional limitation may depend on a condition precedent or a condition subsequent. The owner of an executory interest cannot maintain a suit to prevent waste by the owner of a precedent estate in fee.

Executory interests are not mere possibilities but are certain interests and estates,[99] or, as it has otherwise been stated, they are possibilities coupled with an interest.[1] Such estates arise, when their time comes, of their own inherent strength,[2] and differ from remainders, see supra §§ 76–79, in that they are not required to be supported by a preceding estate,[3] and so are not destructible on account of casualties to the precedent estate.[4]

A conditional limitation may depend on a condition precedent or a condition subsequent.[5]

Protection against waste. It has been held that the holder of a defeasible fee in realty is not subject to a suit to restrain waste by the owner of a subsequent executory interest.[6] ders in that contingent remainders are defeasible on the destruction of the particular estate, while executory limitations are independent of the particular estate, and, as appears infra subdivision c of this section, no act which the first taker may do can defeat the legal consequence of the contingency happening, that is, can defeat the vesting of the estate if the contingency happens. Hence it has been reasoned, see infra subdivision b (2) (c), of this section that where the gift to the first taker is accompanied with the absolute power of disposal, the gift over fails. However, the rule as stated is not universal in its application, for, as appears infra subdivision c, it has been decided that an executory limitation after an estate tail may always be barred by the tenant in tail.

(2) Limitation on Repugnant Contingency
- (a) In general
- (b) Contingency involving restraint on alienation or intestacy
- (c) Limitation after gift with absolute power of disposal
- (d) Limitation after life estate with power of disposal

(a) In General

An executory limitation repugnant to the prior estate, as where the prior estate is a fee simple absolute, is void; but where the prior estate is a fee simple defeasible, or lesser estate, the limitation over is valid.

A condition repugnant to the nature of the estate to which it is annexed is void, see supra § 20, and therefore, as appears in 21 Corpus Juris page 1027 note 51, a gift limited over on such a repugnant contingency fails. So any limitation over after a gift of the fee simple absolute is void, such a limitation being in its very nature repugnant to the prior absolute gift, and this principle has occasionally been made the ground of decision in adjudicated cases.[7] However, an executory limitation over after a gift of a fee simple defeasible is valid.[8] In such cases the question is generally one of intent, whether or not on the whole instrument the intent is clear that the property should go over on a contingency.[9]

(b) Contingency Involving Restraint on Alienation or Intestacy

An executory limitation over after a fee on alienation or attempt at alienation of the fee by the first taker, or of such interest as the first taker does not dispose of or as to which he dies intestate, is void.

A general restraint on alienation of an estate in fee is void, see supra § 8. Thus a limitation over after a fee on alienation or attempt at alienation is void.[10] So too a gift over after a gift of an absolute interest in property real or personal, if the first taker does not dispose of his interest or dies intestate, or a gift over of what remains at his death, is void.[11]

(c) Limitation after Gift with Absolute Power of Disposal

An executory limitation after a gift of a fee simple with an absolute power of disposal is void; but if the power of disposal is limited or conditional, as where the first taker has a fee simple defeasible, the limitation over is valid.

It is generally held, although there is authority to the contrary,[12] that an executory limitation is void after a gift with an absolute power of disposal, either express or implied, in the first taker,[13] regardless of whether the right of disposition is limited to any particular method of conveyance;[14] but the power of disposal must be absolute, and if the first taker's power of disposal is limited or conditional it will not defeat a disposition over.[15] However, this principle does not assert that if an estate in fee is given there cannot be a subsequent limitation over by way of executory limitation, notwithstanding the right of alienation and disposal is incident to every fee.[16] If such were its effect, it would destroy altogether that class of executory limitations which take effect in defeasance or abridgment of the prior estate.[17] A fee may be limited after a fee by executory limitation, as appears supra § 121 b (1), and a limitation may take effect in qualification, abridgment, or defeasance of the preceding estate.[18] The absolute power of disposition in the first taker, to which a limitation over is repugnant, is a power to dispose of the entire estate, including the limitation, and in destruction of the limitation.[19] It is in contradistinction to the power of disposition of a defeasible fee vested in the first taker.[20] So even where the first estate cannot be reduced to one for life, the remainder over may be good, provided the intention to make the first taker's estate a conditional fee is clear.[21] The rule of construction by which such seemingly contradictory clauses are to be tried is the familiar one that a clear gift will not be cut down or altered by any subsequent words, unless they show an equally clear intent.[22]

(d) Limitation after Life Estate with Power of Disposal

As a general rule a limitation over after a life estate with a power of disposal in the life tenant is valid.

A limitation after a life estate contingent on alienation by the life tenant is valid,[23] and a life estate may be given with the power of disposal or appointment superadded, and an executory limitation in default thereof will be good.[24] However, while the principle here announced is theoretically distinct from that which operates where the whole estate is given to the first taker, the cases turn on the wording of the particular will, and no clear distinction between the two classes seems deducible.[25] Where the first estate is for life in express terms it is held, as a general rule, that a general or absolute power of disposition will not enlarge it into a fee, and a limitation over is effective, although it is only of what remains undisposed of, and this applies to both real and personal property;[26] and where after a life estate there is a limitation over in remainder of the property, "if any there be," these words will not enlarge the life estate if, construing the whole will, any other meaning can be given to them.[27] However, in some jurisdictions it is held that an absolute power of disposal will enlarge the estate of the first taker to a fee, even though it is stated in express terms to be a life estate, and that a limitation over of what remains undisposed of at the death of the first taker is void.[28] The life estate may be implied, where such an intent may be gathered from the whole instrument, and the limitation over will take effect.[29]

(3) Remoteness; Rule against Perpetuities

The rule against perpetuities applies with full force to executory limitations, see the C.J.S. title Perpetuities §§ 13, 15, also 48 C.J. p 956 note 47–p 957 note 57, p 959 note 78–p 960 note 85, p 964 notes 11–12, with the exception of certain executory interests not within the evil against which the rule is directed, as limitations to charities, considered in the C.J.S. title Perpetuities § 20, also 48 C.J. p 973 note 11–p 974 note 16. Also the rule is inapplicable to a limitation over after an estate tail where such limitation is construed as a remainder, see the C.J.S. title Perpetuities § 15, also 48 C.J. p 963 note 10.

c. Effect of Action of First Taker

In general an executory interest is indestructible. Subject to an exception in the case of executory limitations after an estate tail, the first taker can do nothing to prevent the executory limitation from taking effect on the happening of the contingency, although he may be empowered, under the terms of the particular devise or conveyance, to determine whether the contingency itself will or will not happen.

In general an executory interest is indestructible,[30] exempt from the power of the first taker.[31] Subject to an exception in the case of executory limitations after an estate tail,[32] no act on the part of the person after whose estate an executory in-

Power to alien defeasible fee not inconsistent

The power of alienation, incident to the vesting of a fee in the first taker, is not inconsistent with the limitation over, for, as the limitation over may take effect in defeasance of the fee, so it may of an estate conveyed under his power of alienation. It may operate not only against the first taker himself, but also against an alienee.—McRee's Adm'rs v. Means, supra.

terest is limited on a contingency can so change the nature of the estate as to prevent the executory limitation taking effect on the happening of the contingency;[33] the first taker cannot defeat a limitation over by any species of alienation;[34] nor can he obtain absolute title by adverse possession so as to defeat an executory limitation over.[35] However, this rule should be distinguished from cases where the estate is so limited that it is in the power of the first taker to prevent the contingency happening and thus, in a sense, to defeat the gift over.[36]

d. Effect of Merger

The doctrine of merger or surrender will not operate to extinguish an executory interest.

An executory interest cannot be destroyed by merger[37] or surrender.[38] A fee defeasible and and an executory fee are successive and not concurrent.[39] Where an executory fee descends to the person to whom a prior defeasible fee is limited, the former estate is not merged so as to extinguish the executory interest.[40] However, where a defeasible fee and successive executory limitations, which together constitute the fee simple absolute, are united in one person the various interests merge in such person so as to constitute a fee simple absolute.[41]

e. Effect of Failure of Prior Gift on Gift Over

In general an executory interest limited over after a prior estate will not fail because of failure of the prior estate, unless the conditions which cause the first estate to fail are such as to create the situation under which the subsequent limitation was not to take effect.

In general an executory interest limited over after a prior estate will not fail because of the failure of the prior estate, either ab initio or at any time before it becomes indefeasible in the donee;[42] if the precedent estate never arises or takes effect,[43] whether it be by the death of the first tenant before the estate vests in him or his nonexistence,[44] the subsequent limitation becomes effective, the first estate being considered only as a preceding limitation, and not as a preceding condition to give effect to a subsequent limitation.[45] However, the ulterior limitation will fail on the failure of the precedent estate ab initio if it is so connected with, and dependent on, the primary one that it cannot, consistently with the provisions of the instrument, have effect if the primary one fails ab initio.[46] So if the precedent estate fails under circumstances which, if they had happened after the first interest became effective, would have defeated the subsequent interest,[47] or, if all the events have happened on which the first taker's estate is contingent, so that his estate is absolute and indefeasible, and arises even though he dies in the testator's lifetime,[48] the limitation over fails. Where a limitation over is given for the accomplishment of certain objects in connection with the precedent estate, the failure of the precedent estate under conditions which make impossible the accomplishment of the objects intended will cause the limitation over to fail if it was the consideration and inducement for the accomplishment of the objects intended in connection with the precedent estate.[49]

on not making a particular disposition of the property, if the first taker dies in testator's lifetime, it has been held that the gift over takes effect.[50]

Alternative limitation. If an estate, legal or equitable, is given by deed or will to a person in the first instance and then over to another person on alternative contingencies, either one of which, if it occurs, will, under the terms of the instrument, exclude the existence of the other, and is not merely a limitation over on one double contingency or on the happening of two events which the testator or grantor has not separated, the validity of the limitation over depends on the event, if under one contingency it will be void for remoteness and under the other it will not; or, in other words, if the limitation over is on one contingency which must happen, if at all, within the limit of the rule against perpetuities, and that contingency does happen, the limitation over is valid, even though on a different contingency it would have been void for remoteness.[51]

Acceleration. Where the preceding estate fails, if the instrument creating the estate designates some future time for the vesting of the limitation over such direction will be followed.[52]

f. Effect of Failure of Gift Over on Prior Gift

The failure of a limitation over because the contingency on which it is to arise is illegal or impossible will ordinarily cause the precedent defeasible fee to become absolute.

Where a fee or absolute interest is liable to be defeated on a contingency on which a gift over is to take effect, the general rule is that if the contingency is illegal or becomes impossible, so that the gift over can never arise, the prior interest becomes absolute and indefeasible, the intent being that the prior interest is to be defeated only for the benefit of the ulterior interest.[53]

Where the gift over is void for remoteness the prior estate is absolute.[54]

g. Taking Effect of Prior Executory Interest

In a series of limitations all limitations subsequent to an executory limitation are executory, and when an executory limitation vests in possession all consecutive limitations capable of taking effect as remainders are changed into remainders; but a limitation which cannot be supported as a remainder and all those following it continue as executory limitations.

Where, in a series of limitations, one is an executory limitation, all subsequent limitations are likewise executory, and when the first limitation vests in possession the whole series of subsequent limitations are changed into remainders provided they are capable of taking effect as remainders.[55] However, if the limitation immediately after the executory limitation which has vested is not so connected with it as to be supported by it as a remainder, but can be valid as an executory devise, its nature and that of the limitation following it are not changed.[56]

h. Devolution and Alienation

In general, sometimes by force of statute, executory interests are alienable, devisable, and inheritable. The holder of the precedent estate may alienate his interest.

Executory interests, so far as concerns their alienation or transmission, are governed by the same rules as contingent remainders.[57] In equity such interests are assignable.[58] At law such interests were at first considered to be nothing more than possibilities and therefore not assignable,[59] but under the view, which soon came to be held, that they constitute possibilities coupled with an interest, see supra § 122 a, it is held that such an interest is alienable,[60] and as such assignable,[61] capable of conveyance by deed, see Deeds § 15 b, may be the subject of a mortgage, see the C.J.S. title Mortgages § 75, also 41 Corpus Juris p 374 notes 63–64, and may be released,[62] or the person entitled estopped by his warranty deed.[63] It is likewise held that such interests are devisable, see the C.J.S. title Wills § 85, also 68 C.J. p 498 note 89–p 499 note 97, and transmissible by descent, see Descent and Distribution § 18. In a number of jurisdictions by force of express statutory provisions such interests are alienable, devisable, and inheritable.[64] The preceding principles do not apply, however, where the object of the limitation over is not ascertained nor ascertainable until the contingency happens, for then the executory devise is a possibility not coupled with an interest, and it cannot be either devised or aliened.[65] Executory limitations which are so worded as to convey no interest unless the executory devisee survives the happening of the contingency have been held to carry no interest either devisable, descendible, or alienable, prior to the contingency happening.[66]

Judicial sale. Where any members of a class to which an executory devise is limited are in esse, the court may, on a proper case being made, order a sale of the land devised; the rule is otherwise where no such members are in esse.[67] A partition sale will not be decreed where it appears that the title to the land is subject to be divested out of petitioners by the terms of an executory devise.[68]

Precedent estate. The holder of a defeasible fee which is subject to an executory limitation over on the happening of a condition subsequent may alienate his interest, which is, of course, subject to a defeasance on the happening of the event on which the executory interest is limited.[69]

VIII. MERGER OF ESTATES

§ 123. In General

a. In general
b. Statement of doctrine

a. In General

The doctrine of merger originated from the principles of feudal tenures, and relates only to estates in land.

In strict technical meaning, the doctrine of merger of estates appears to have been derived from the principles applicable to feudal tenures, and hence to have relation only to estates in land.[70] So it is said that the doctrine applies to estates in land into which the original estate in fee simple may have been divided, and not to different divisions of a tract of land, whether these divisions are horizontal or vertical.[71] The doctrine is founded on the maxim, Nemo potest esse tenens et dominus,[72] although it has been said to be an application of the equity maxim that equity, in viewing the transaction of men, and in determining the rights and liabilities arising therefrom, looks to the real intent of the parties as constituting the essential substance, and not at the mere external form.[73]

b. Statement of Doctrine

The doctrine of merger of estates is that whenever a greater and a less estate meet in the same person without an intermediate estate the less is immediately annihilated.

The Corpus Juris statement of the doctrine of merger of estates, which has been quoted by the courts, is that whenever a greater and a less estate coincide and meet in one and the same person, without any intermediate estate, the less is immediately annihilated; or in the law phrase it is said to be merged, that is, sunk or drowned in the greater.[74] The merger is produced either from the guished.[78] A merger will not be allowed where several interests are limited by the same instrument, or take effect in the same instance of time, and, in some degree, by the same act, and some other person is concerned in the consequence of the merger, and the merger, if taking place, would either alter the quality of one of two estates in the same person, or destroy a remainder intended for another person.[79]

§ 124. Application of Rule at Law and in Equity

While merger of estates is not favored at law or in equity, the doctrine is inflexible at law, but in equity its application rests on principles of justice and the intention of the parties. The controlling principle is the intention of the persons in whom the estates unite.

It is often stated that merger of estates is not favored either in courts of law[80] or in courts of equity.[81] Indeed, in some jurisdictions the doctrine has been expressly abolished.[82] At law, the rule that whenever a greater estate and a less coincide in the same person without any intermediate estate the lesser is merged is invariable and inflexible,[83] and takes effect in some instances, at least, without regard to the question of intention; but this has been questioned,[84] and the tendency of at least some of the courts is to admit and apply the same

Charge merged
At law, a man cannot be his own creditor or debtor; hence, when he acquires an estate subject to a charge in his own favor, the charge will, in law, merge in the estate.—Hurst v. Spotts, 144 A. 91, 204 Pa. 221—Van Orner's Est., 25 Pa.Super. 234.

principle in both law and equity.[85] However, generally in equity the rules of law as to merger are not followed.[86] Equity will prevent or permit a merger as will best subserve the purposes of justice and the actual and just intent of the parties,[87] whether expressed or implied.[88] The doctrine of merger has its foundation in the convenience of the parties interested, and therefore whenever the rights of strangers, not parties to the act, that would otherwise work an extinguishment of the particular estate, require it, the two estates will still be considered as having a separate continuance.[89] Wherever a merger would operate inequitably it will be prevented.[90]

Equity will intervene to prevent merger of separate estates held in single ownership, only where some right or just advantage would be lost to owner of two estates if lesser were merged in greater estate.—Wilson v. McLaughlin, 67 P.2d 710, 20 Cal App.2d 608.

Charge

(1) Equity will prevent merger, where owner of fee becomes owner of charge, when necessary to carry out parties' intention.—Hurst v. Spotts, 144 A. 91, 294 Pa. 221.

Merger does not always follow the union of a greater and lesser estate in the same ownership.[91] The controlling consideration is the intention, expressed or implied, of the person in whom the estates unite,[92] provided the intention is just and fair,[93] and a merger will not be permitted contrary to such intent.[94] Where there is no expression of intention, it will be sought for in all the circumstances.

Question of fact

As respects whether merger of estates takes place, actual or presumed intention of person in whom interests are united is question of fact to be tried and determined in the same manner as are other issues.—Goldblatt v. Gannon, 37 P.2d 524, 95 Colo. 419.

Time of intention

(1) In determining whether merger occurs, test ordinarily applied is parties' intention at time two estates meet in same person, and not some subsequent purpose.—Thorburn v. Wende, 257 N.Y.S. 186, 235 App.Div. 424, modifying 255 N.Y.S. 979, 235 App.Div. 757, affirming Wende v. Wende, 251 N.Y.S. 773, 141 Misc. 52.

(2) When title to fee vests in owner of other estate by inheritance or by devise or bequest, owner has reasonable time to determine whether merger shall result, if rights of third parties do not intervene.—Delaware Nat. Bank of Delhi, N. Y., v. Wiss, 284 N.Y.S. 615, 158 Misc. 276.

Merger aiding fraud

(1) Where it would work an injury or wrong, or aid in effecting a fraud, a merger of legal and equitable estates will not take place, and any extraordinary circumstances which would indicate that the prevention of the merger would have such an evil effect can be established as a defense against the interference of equity.—Swatts v. Bowen, 40 N.E. 1057, 141 Ind. 322.

(2) Equity will never allow a merger to be prevented and a mortgage or other security to be kept alive when this result would aid in carrying a fraud or other unconscientious wrong into effect under cover of legal forms, but only interposes to prevent a merger so as thereby to work substantial justice.—Dilts v. Brooks, 213 P. 600, 66 Mont. 346.

Contrary to party's will

The doctrine of merger of estates is designed primarily for the benefit of one who acquires an interest in stances of the transaction,[95] and may be gathered not only from the acts and declarations of the owner of the several and independent rights[96] but from a view of the situation as affecting his interests,[97] at least prior to the presence of some right in a third person.[98] Equity will presume such an intent as is consistent with the best interests of the party;[99] and the same presumption is indulged where the party is an infant[1] or person of unsound mind.[2] The intent of the party does not become fixed and unchangeable until some one acquires an interest in the property, and thereby a right to draw such intent in question.[3]

§ 125. Conditions Essential to Merger

The essentials for a merger of estates are: Two or more distinct estates of greater and lesser rank; a valid greater estate; a meeting of the estates in one person or class of persons; coincidence in time of meeting; absence of intervening estates; and a holding of the estates in the same right.

The doctrine of merger of estates rests on actualities, not on mere possibilities, so that coincidence of two independent estates presently held by one and the same person or class of persons is a necessary prerequisite.[4] In order that there may be a merger it is essential that there should be at least two distinct estates,[5] a greater and a property greater than he possessed in the first instance, and will not be held to apply against his will, to his disadvantage.—Landrum v. Carey, 194 S.E. 362, 185 Ga. 76—Seaboard Air-Line Ry. Co. v. Holliday, 140 S.E. 507, 165 Ga. 200—Luquire v. Lee, 49 S.E. 834, 121 Ga. 624.

Burden of proof

When the circumstances under which merger ordinarily takes place are shown, the burden rests on him who alleges that there was no merger to prove a contrary intention, or to prove facts and circumstances from which such an intention may be presumed.

lesser,[6] meeting in the same person[7] or class of persons,[8] at the same time[9] and without any intervening estate.[10] The estates must also generally be held in the same right,[11] but, while this is true where one estate is an accession to the other merely by operation of law, there may be a merger of two estates held in different rights which meet in the same person by act of the parties.[12]

Greater estate avoided. In order that the lesser estate merge in the greater, the greater estate must be assumed as valid and continuing; there can be no merger when the estates are successive and not concurrent, nor when the greater estate is void and has been avoided.[13]

§ 126. Life Estates

When the essentials of a merger of estates are present, a life estate will merge in the next vested estate in remainder or reversion expectant thereon, either completely or pro tanto. However, such merger will be prevented in equity when necessary to protect the rights of innocent third parties or the rights of the person in whom the estates meet, and where contrary to the intention of such person.

Whenever a particular estate for life and the next vested estate in remainder or reversion expectant thereon meet in the same person the former estate is merged,[14] provided the estate in remainder or reversion is as large as the preceding estate,[15] the estates are held in the same right,[16] there is no intervening estate,[17] and provided the remainder has vested.[18] However, this rule relates to a conveyance by the life tenant and the reversioner to a third person of both the life estate and the reversion,[19] and does not apply where a person takes a life estate under a will and, on the testator's death, becomes invested with the reversion in fee by descent pending the taking effect of the contingent remainder.[20] If the owner of a life estate acquires the fee to only a portion of the remainder there will be a merger pro tanto,[21] but the life estate in the remainder of the property will not be affected.[22] So where the holder of the life estate conveys a share of such estate to one of the remaindermen, a merger pro tanto results.[23] However, a conveyance by one of several life tenants of the life estate to the remainderman does not work a merger.[24] Merger pro tanto also results where the owner of the fee simple in remainder in the whole property acquires a life estate in a portion of the property[25] as well as in the remainder or reversion in fee.[26] An estate pur autre vie may

Defeasible fee

Where a will devises property in trust for life to testatrix's children, and on their death, without issue, before distribution, to certain reversionaries, after a final distribution, a defeasible fee is conveyed.—Owen v. Burks, 151 S.W. 369, 151 Ky. 162.

Execution sale

Acquisition of a life estate by a remainderman by execution sale does not call for a merger of the estates.—Williams v. Williams, 202 N.W. 434, 200 Iowa 398, rehearing denied and amended on other ground 204 N.W. 156.

Rent of life estate

(1) If a remainderman rents an estate for life, for and during the life of the person entitled to it, the life estate is merged in the remainder.—McCullough v. Carpenter, Mo., 225 S.W. 674.

(2) However, this rule does not apply to a lease of farm land under an oral contract in which a yearly rent is reserved.—McCullough v. Carpenter, supra.

(3) Likewise, the rule is inapplicable where the lease is to a husband whose wife is the remainderman.—McCullough v. Carpenter, supra.

Revocation of reservation of life estate

Where a grantor who has conveyed the fee but has reserved a life estate subsequently executes a deed not containing such reservation for the express purpose of revoking the first, the doctrine of merger is inapplicable.—Butler v. Bell, 106 S.E. 217, 181 N.C. 85.

merge in an estate for the tenant's own life.[27] In equity the merger will be prevented whenever necessary to protect the rights of an innocent third person,[28] or of the person in whom the estates meet,[29] or when a merger would be contrary to the intention of such person.[30]

Even if a life estate in income of realty devised in fee be deemed valid, such life estate becomes merged in the fee.[31]

§ 127. Estates for Years

An estate for years may merge with the remainder or reversion, unless the one is legal and the other equitable. However, equity will prevent the merger when necessary to protect the interests of the person in whom the estates meet.

An estate for years may merge in the remainder or reversion in fee.[32] A legal title for a term of years cannot be merged where the title to the reversion is merely equitable.[33] The estates must be held in the same right.[34] Equity will prevent the merger of an estate for years, if necessary to protect the interests of the person in whom the estates meet.[35]

§ 128. Equitable Estates

Except when contrary to the intention of the parties or essential to justice, the general but not unanimous rule is that when legal and equitable estates meet in the same person the equitable is merged with the legal. On the other hand, legal estates do not merge with the equitable.

One may have as many equitable claims on a piece of land as he can obtain, and they will all subsist without merger, for it may take them all to make a complete equitable title;[36] but it is generally held, although there is authority to the contrary,[37] that whenever the legal and equitable estates in the same land become united in the same person the equitable is merged in the legal estate,[38] unless there is an intervening estate,[39] or the intention of the party in whom they unite is to the contrary,[40] or it is manifestly to his interest,[41] or essential to the ends of justice,[42] or necessary to

Reason for rule
The doctrine of merger springs from the fact that when the entire equitable and legal estates are united in the same person, there can be no occasion to keep them distinct, for ordinarily it would be of no use to the owner to keep up a charge on the estate of which he was seized in fee simple, but if there is an outstanding, intervening title, the foundation for the merger does not exist, and as a matter of law, it is so declared.

protect the rights of an innocent third person,[43] or necessary to carry out the purposes and intentions of the donors,[44] that the estates should be kept separate. However, there can be no merger of a legal in an equitable estate so as to extinguish the legal title.[45] It is essential that there be both a legal and an equitable estate uniting in the same person,[46] and that the two estates should be coextensive and commensurate,[47] or more accurately, the legal estate must be equally extensive with or more extensive than the equitable estate, for the equitable fee will not merge in a particular or partial interest.[48]

When a husband acquires the fee, his right of curtesy becomes merged in the fee.

Where a husband becomes the owner in fee of land in which he has a curtesy right, the curtesy right is merged in the fee.[49] However, where the husband conveys his interest to one of several children and such child's wife, reserving his curtesy rights, and subsequently receives a conveyance of such grantees' interests, his right of curtesy is not merged in the fee.[50]

§ 130. Dower

Subject to the interests of the widow and those of creditors, unless contrary to the intention of the parties dower will merge with an estate in fee or a life estate acquired by the widow. The doctrine of merger has been applied as well to the inchoate right of dower, although there is contrary authority.

Where a widow becomes the owner in fee of land in which she has a dower right, the dower right is merged in the fee,[51] except where it is manifestly to her interest that the two titles should be kept distinct.[52] The doctrine has been applied to the inchoate right of dower,[53] notwithstanding this right is not an estate so that technically the doctrine of merger would not apply,[54] but this has been denied.[55] Where the widow is in possession as life tenant, the dower right merges with such interest.[56] However, merger will not occur where one estate is acquired by purchase and the other by dower,[57] nor is the right of dower merged in a superior estate by deed between the widow and heirs, in which the widow's dower interest is merely recognized and the interest of the several parties conveyed inter se.[58] Likewise, where there are two classes of creditors involved, if the merger of the dower interest in the fee will adversely affect one class it will not be allowed.[59] If the dower becomes a charge on the land and the owner of the fee becomes the owner of such charge, the charge of dower will not be merged in the fee when contrary to the intention of the parties.[60]

§ 131. Estates Tail

The doctrine of merger of estates does not apply to estates tail.

An estate tail is an exception to the rule of merger, and a man may have in his own right both an estate tail and a reversion in fee.[61]

IX. ESTATES IN PERSONAL PROPERTY

§ 132. In General

There may be estates or interests in personal property which are less than the absolute title or interest, and such estates or interests are governed, in the main, by the general principles that govern similar estates or interests in real property.

Subject to certain limitations, an estate or interest for life, considered infra §§ 133–137, or an estate or interest for a term of years,[62] in one person, with remainder over to another, considered infra § 139, may be created in personal property, and, by analogy, such estates or interests are governed, in the main, by the same general principles that govern in the case of similar estates in real property.[63]

§ 133. Life Estates

It is permissible to create a life estate in personal property, and the life tenant may enforce or protect his rights by an appropriate suit or action.

While the common law originally did not admit of the creation of a life estate in personal property with a reversion or a remainder over,[64] and a gift for life carried the absolute title or interest,[65] yet it is now well settled that life estates may be created in personal property,[66] including money,[67] and personal property of a durable nature,[68] with a remainder over to others, considered infra § 139.

By analogy, such estates are governed, in the main, by the principles which govern in the case of similar estates in real property.[69] It has been stated broadly, however, that life estates in personal property are not favored.[70] As to gifts of property

Gift of income

According to some cases the gift of the income of personal property for life is a gift of a life estate in such property.—Bradbury v. Jackson, 54 A. 1068, 1072, 97 Me. 449—Sampson v. Randall, 72 Me. 109.

Statutory regulation

Under statute prohibiting creation of life estates in property "such as is destroyed in the use," the quoted phrase does not refer to property of a substantial nature which depreciates from use over a substantial period of time, such as barber shop equipment.—First Nat. Bank v. Geiger, 7 S.E.2d 756, 61 Ga.App. 865.

Forfeiture

In respect of the ancient law that a tenant for life might forfeit his estate by claiming the fee in a court of record, it was said that "there does not seem to be any good reason for its application in reference to slaves, except in the case provided for by the statute, of the removal of them out of the state by the tenant for life, without the consent of the person in reversion of remainder. A claim of absolute property in slaves by a tenant for life might justify the person in reversion or remainder to bring an equitable action to establish his right, and to restrain the tenant for life from the commission of any act inconsistent with that right"—Hart v. Rentals due under lease

A lease agreement for ninety-nine years which provided that rent should be paid to the lessor during her life and thereafter to her daughter during the latter's life, and, after the death of the daughter, to the heirs of the lessor created successive life estates in praesenti in the lessor and her daughter.—Landers Inv. In an action by one entitled to the dividends on shares of corporate stock for life for an accounting and declaration of dividends, based on the theory that a surplus was accumulated over a long period of years in order to increase the value of defendant directors' remainder interest in such shares, the action was not barred by the statute of limitations.[74]

§ 134. Possession of Property

a. General considerations

b. Requirement of inventory

c. Requirement of security; alternative appointment of trustee

a. General Considerations

Whether or not the life tenant is entitled to possession is determined by the provisions of the instrument creating the life estate, and usually he is entitled to possession where specific chattels are bequeathed but not where personal property is included in a general residuary clause.

It has been stated broadly that, in the case of a direct bequest of personal property with remainder over, the general rule is that the life tenant is entitled to possession and control if the will does not show a contrary intention,[75] but the test sometimes applied in determining whether the life tenant or beneficiary is entitled to possession or custody is whether the will makes a specific bequest with right of enjoyment in specie, so that the general rule for conversion is not applicable.[76] Where specific chattels are bequeathed for life, the life-tenant is entitled to the actual possession of the property,[77] and cannot be compelled to submit to a sale or a commutation of his interest;[78] but where

Property of durable nature
In respect of property of a durable nature, it has been stated broadly that possession is in the life tenant during the life estate.—Kadyk v. Abbott, 266 Ill.App. 537.
Partnership assets
Where, by will, a member of a partnership gave his wife a life estate in his personal property, it was stated broadly that, after the settlement of the partnership affairs and the debts of the testator, the widow, as life tenant, was entitled to possession of the remaining personal property which was subject to the life estate, in the absence of an agreement that the business should be continued as theretofore.—Thompson v. Bequest of corporate stock, bonds, and the like Under a testamentary provision that the stocks, bonds, mortgages, or other investments owned by testatrix at the time of her death are to be divided among specified persons during the terms of their natural lives, the life tenants were entitled to the custody of the property bequeathed, subject to furnishing security to protect the estate of the remainderman, notwithstanding another provision for the application of income to payment of debts of testatrix.—Owens v. Owens' Ex'r, 32 S.W. 2d 731, 236 Ky. 118.
Right to use of property
Where testator obviously intended that articles should not be sold, and that a life beneficiary should have use of them, articles to be turned over to remainderman in specie on termination of trust, it was held that such beneficiary was entitled to possession of such articles during her lifetime; the question as to whether security could be dispensed with was not passed on as the life beneficiary did not claim the right to possession without security.—In re Rohr's Estate, 175 N.Y.S. 593.

personal property is included in a general residuary bequest for life,[79] where there is a general bequest of all of testator's personal estate for life,[80] or, as more broadly stated, where there is a general bequest for life,[81] usually the property should be held, or should be sold and the proceeds held or invested, by the executor or trustee and the interest or income paid to the life tenant or beneficiary, the principal being kept for the remainderman, unless the will shows a contrary intention on the part of testator.[82]

While the view has been taken that, in the case of a direct bequest of money with remainder over, the general rule is that the life beneficiary is entitled to possession if the will does not show a contrary intention,[83] it has been held or recognized that an executor or trustee should hold and invest a bequest of money for life,[84] and should sell and invest the proceeds of property, the use of which is

Proceeds of mortgage
Where a mortgage held by the testator was bequeathed to a life beneficiary, the executor, on foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the property, should have applied to the appropriate court for authority to invest the proceeds.—Miller v. Williamson, 5 Md. 219.

In Illinois
(1) The rule has been announced that where a testator gives to one for life a certain sum of money, with a limitation over to another, the former has no right to possession of the money so bequeathed.—Welsch v. Belleville Sav. Bank, 94 Ill. 191.

(2) In a case in which a deposit in bank was included in the bequest for life, it was stated broadly that a life tenant may obtain the possession of the property under such reasonable restrictions as the courts may impose.—Quigley v. Quigley, 18 N.E.2d 186, 370 Ill. 151.

In New Jersey
(1) Under bequest to legatee of use of a fund during his life and at his death fund to go to others, executors were required to retain fund as trustees and to invest it and pay income thereof to legatee during his lifetime, and at his death to distribute such part as remained to residuary legatees, where will, fairly construed, did not indicate an intention that legacy was specifically bequeathed and to be enjoyed in specie as to make general rule for conversion inapplicable.—In re Kellogg's Estate, 129 A. 742, 3 N.J.Misc. 694.

(2) In the absence of a provision of the will showing a contrary intention, the executor is entitled to hold the fund in the case of a bequest of the income of a specified sum for life.—Smith v. Field, 131 A. 521, 98 N.J.Eq. 532.

(3) Where a specified sum was bequeathed for the life of the legatee, the latter was not entitled to possession in the absence of anything in the will indicating a contrary intention.—In re Van Wagoner, Prerog. 97 A. 893.

(4) But in an earlier case the view was expressed that, where a specific sum of money is given for life, the money must be paid to the legatee.—Jones' Ex'rs v. Stites, 19 N.J.Eq. 324.

its conversion into money,[85] or the possession of which is not essential to its beneficial enjoyment,[86] or, according to some cases, which is of a perishable character,[87] unless the will shows an intention that the possession of the fund or property should be intrusted to the life tenant.[88]

A person bequeathing a life estate in money with a remainder over may confide the money to the life tenant, trusting to such life tenant to preserve the fund for the benefit of the remainderman,[89] but the court will not intrust to the tenant of the particular estate the corpus of the personalty, unless it can from the language of the will infer that such was the intention of testator.[90]

Effect of right to encroach on principal. In general the life tenant or beneficiary who is authorized by the will to encroach on the principal for his own use or purposes is entitled to the possession and management of the property,[91] but, in the case of a residuary bequest of personal property with right of the life beneficiary to use the income and to consume such portion of the principal as he shall need, it has been held that the executor is entitled to hold the fund,[92] and the general rule will not necessarily govern where the circumstances disclose that the rights of the remainderman would be menaced by delivering the property to the life tenant.[93]

Adverse possession. The right to possession extends to the proceeds of property which the life tenant, in possession under the instrument creating the life estate, has sold pursuant to authority conferred by such instrument.[94]

As a general rule the possession of personal property by a life tenant is in harmony with rights of remainderman and cannot in law become adverse to such rights[95] or, as otherwise stated, the life tenant's holding is not adverse to the remainderman, but is amicable to the latter, the possession of the life tenant being the possession of the remainderman.[96] The view has been taken, however, that, while the possession of a tenant for life is not adverse to the remainderman because it is entirely consistent with the latter's right and does not deprive him of anything to which he is entitled,[97] so far as a life estate only is claimed, the possession of one claiming the tenancy for life is adverse to the remaindermen and all others, and possession for the statutory period gives him a right to the extent of the interest claimed.[98]

b. Requirement of Inventory

Usually the life tenant may be required to furnish an inventory on taking possession of personal property which is subject to the life estate.

Where a life estate is given in personal property the tenant on taking possession may be required to file an inventory thereof,[99] with acknowledgement that it is held for life only, with title in the remainderman;[1] but, in the absence of a showing of danger of loss or injury, this is the only protection to which the remainderman is entitled,[2] at least where specific chattels are given for the life of the donee.[3]

c. Requirement of Security; Alternative Appointment of Trustee

Security for the forthcoming of the property at the termination of the life estate is not necessarily required in order to entitle the life tenant to possession, but, if there is danger of loss or injury, it is usually within the discretion of the proper court to require security, or, in some jurisdictions at least, to appoint a trustee if security is not furnished.

A tenant for life of personal property, in order to be entitled to possession, is not necessarily obliged to give security for the forth coming of the property at the termination of the life estate;[4] usually, if he is otherwise entitled to possession, security is required only where there is a showing of actual danger of loss or injury,[5] and it cannot be demanded as a matter of absolute right,[6] unless it is so provided by statute.[7] It is, however, within the discretion of the court to require security,[8] and, under certain circumstances, it should be re-

(1) "Ordinarily, where a legal life estate is created, the life tenant is required to furnish a bond. . . . Having in mind the possibility of waste, extravagance, loss of securities, or other dissipation of assets by a life tenant, the courts have uniformly imposed this salutary rule as a protection to the remainderman, except in cases where an express direction dispensing with a bond is found in the will, or is clearly inferred from its provisions."—In re Taylor's Estate, 268 N.Y.S. 70, 73, 149 Misc. 705, affirmed In re Taylor's Will, 271 N.Y.S. 1057, 242 App.Div. 608.

(2) "A life tenant, if she wishes to take the funds of the estate into her possession, is required to give a bond for the protection of the remainderman, unless she has a right to invade the principal, or it clearly appears that the decedent desired her to have such possession without the giving of security."—In re Richardson's Estate, 238 N.Y.S. 271, 272, 135 Misc. 726, affirmed 243 N.Y.S. 845, 229 App.Div. 271.

Life tenant seeking possession

Under some statutes a legatee for life under a will by which a remainder to another is given and in which no trustee is named, in order to obtain possession, must apply to a designated court and give bond for the safe-keeping of the property, unless the testator has directed that possession shall be given to such legatee without requiring a bond or unless the remainderman consents to delivery to such legatee without such requirement.—Sanford v. Gilman, 44 Conn. 461.

Bond of life tenant

(1) Under some circumstances the bond of a life tenant under a will has been regarded as a sufficient compliance with the applicable statute.—Zehender's Estate, 8 Pa.Dist. 439.

(2) In a case in which the will gave the daughter of the testatrix the right to use certain jewelry for life, it was held that a bond of the daughter, joined in by her husband, without other surety, was sufficient, especially in view of the acquiescence of all the persons who were interested.—Graham's Estate, 26 Pa.Dist. 417.

In Louisiana a usufructuary must give bond unless it is dispensed with by the instrument creating the usufruct or the requirement is waived by the owner of the property.—Maguire v. Maguire, 34 So. 443, 110 La. 279—Weller's Succession, 31 So. 883, 107 La. 466.

quired,[9] unless it appears from the proper construction of the instrument creating the estate that it was the intention of the grantor that the life tenant should be put into possession without security.[10] Even where the will shows an intention that the possession of the property should be intrusted to the life tenant the court may require security if it appears necessary for the protection of the rights of the remainderman.[11]

Particular circumstances affecting requirement. Usually security should be required whenever it is shown that the property is in actual danger of loss or injury,[12] or where it has been removed from the state,[13] or there is actual danger of its being removed;[14] or where the life tenant is a nonresident,[15] or insolvent.[16]

Where the articles left are perishable, the use of which consists in their consumption, usually no security is required of the legatee.[17] Where, however, a will shows an intention that they should not

Direction for equal division

Where will provided for equal division of personal property and money among children of testator, to be retained by them for and during their natural lives, failure to require security from them for the benefit of the remaindermen was not erroneous, since direction for equal division indicated intention that delivery should be made to life tenants without requiring security.—Rife v. Rife, 122 So. 739, 154 Miss. 529.

Exoneration from giving bond as executor or trustee

(1) Mere fact that testator has indicated his desire that the life tenant, in his capacity as executor, shall not be required to give a bond does not necessarily show that the testator intended that security should not be required when the life tenant, as such, takes possession of the property.
Ill.—Gahan v. Golden, 162 N.E. 164, 330 Ill. 624.

(2) In a case in which security was required, the view was expressed that the fact that, while testator expressly relieved the executors and trustees from giving a bond, he made no provision in that regard as to the life tenant was significant, notwithstanding the life tenant was one of the executors and trustees.—In re Bachrach's Estate, 245 N.Y.S. 647, 138 Misc. 367.

(3) In a case in which it was held that a trust was not created because a person cannot legally be a sole trustee and sole beneficiary and, therefore, that the named beneficiary took a life estate, it was held that, while the testator's declaration that he did not wish his widow to give a bond as executrix and trustee might indicate that he did not desire her to give security under any circumstances, it did not conclusively show an intention not to require security if the widow should take possession as life tenant.—In re Richardson's Estate, 238 N.Y.S. 271, 135 Misc. 726, affirmed 243 N.Y.S. 845, 229 App.Div. 271.

(4) But, where will gave life estate in residuary to widow of testator with vested remainders to testator's children and directed that widow should not be required to give bond or undertaking as executrix or as trustee, but did not create a trust, the widow, as life tenant, was not required to give security before payment or delivery to her of corpus of residuary estate.—In re Beard's Will, 8 N.Y.S.2d 91, 169 Misc. 474.

Bequest in lieu of dower

Fact that bequest for life to widow of testator was in lieu of dower did not authorize delivery to her without exacting security.—Matter of McDougall, 35 N.E. 961, 141 N.Y. 21, reversing 21 N.Y.S. 479, 65 Hun 624.

be consumed but go to the party in remainder, equity will in cases of danger require the life tenant to give security.[18] Where the articles left may depreciate by using them but will not be consumed or worn out in that way, the life legatee, under ordinary circumstances and risks, is allowed to retain possession of the articles without giving security for their preservation.[19] Where, however, the subject matter of the life estate is money or its equivalent or is such property as must be converted into money, usually security should be required;[20] but where the beneficiary is something more than life tenant and has the power to use in his discretion some portion of the principal for his support or otherwise, he is as a general rule entitled to the custody of the fund without security.[21]

The possession of the property by a wrongdoer who claims the entire title as his own is sufficient ground for requiring security.[22]

The fact that the remainderman is indebted to the life tenant for an amount loaned from the fund which is subject to the life estate will not affect the right to demand security but may be considered by the court in determining the amount.[23]

Where the life tenant purchases real property with the funds received by him as life tenant, or with the proceeds of the sale by him of personal property which was subject to the life estate and the remainderman does not question such purchase, it has been held that title to the real property should be placed in the life tenant for life, with remainder to the person entitled thereto, as shown infra § 141, but a trustee should not be appointed or security required of the life tenant.[24]

Security from third person. Security may be required from one who purchases the life estate from the life tenant[25] or at a sale under execution.[26] It has been held, however, that a purchaser for a valuable consideration without notice of the rights of the remainderman should not be required to give security where he has himself sold the property before receiving notice.[27]

Legatee responsible and no showing of danger of waste

Where a life legacy consists of money and the will provides that it shall be paid to the life legatee, the practice prevails in courts of chancery to require security from the life legatee, notwithstanding he may be perfectly responsible and even though there is no showing that there is danger of waste.—Tripp v. Krauth, 171 N.E. 919, 340 Ill. 11—Pratt v. Skiff, 124 N.E. 534, 289 Ill. 268—21 C.J. p 966 note 64.

In North Carolina the rule is that when the bequest is specific and is not of the residuum, the executor should deliver the property to the one to whom it is given for life, taking an inventory and receipt for the benefit of the remainderman, and this rule applies to money as well as to other personal property.—Simmons v. Statute not applicable

(1) Some statutes requiring a life tenant to give bond to secure remaindermen's interests on taking over property devised do not apply to a life tenant having power of consumption of principal.—In re Powell's Estate, 17 A.2d 391, 340 Pa. 404.

(2) The view has been expressed that, where there is an enlargement or amplification of a gift of a life estate by the use of additional words and phrases contained in the will, the court in its discretion may accept the bond of the life tenant without security.—Hess's Estate, 17 Pa.Dist. & Co. 793, 43 Lanc.L.Rev. 86.

Bond as testamentary trustee

In a case in which the will gave the life tenant control of the property and the right to use the principal, if necessary, for his support and maintenance, no bond was required; in respect of the suggestion that, since the life tenant became a trustee for the remainderman, a bond should be required of him as testamentary trustee, it was pointed out that the will was executed before Sept. 1, 1914, and that Surrogate's Court Act § 169 does not require a bond where a will was so executed.—In re Niles' Will, 202 N.Y.S. 475, 122 Misc. 17, affirmed 206 N.Y.S. 940, 211 App.Div. 826.

Where the execution purchaser claims the entire interest under a sale where the life estate only was liable he will be required to give security.—McDougal v. Armstrong, 6 Humphr., Tenn., 428.

27. Va.—Chisholm v. Starke, 3 Call, 25, 7 Va. 25.

Right of life tenant to take possession on giving security. Even in cases in which the life tenant is entitled only to the income for life, it has been held or recognized that he may be entitled to obtain possession of the corpus or principal on giving adequate security,[28] and that, even though the life tenant is not entitled to possession as a matter of right, the court may require delivery of possession to him on his furnishing adequate security.[29] So one to whom the net estate of a decedent has been bequeathed for life may be entitled to the possession and control and management of the estate, consisting of money, on giving proper and adequate security.[30]

Authority and duty of executor. In cases in which the life tenant is not entitled to possession as of right without giving security, it has been held or recognized that the executor may exact security before giving possession,[31] and that, on obtaining security, he has authority to deliver the property to the life tenant.[32] Under some circumstances, it is the duty of the executor to require security before delivering the property to the life tenant.[33] The executor's duty to demand security exists, however, only where the testator has not manifested an intention that the property should be delivered to the life tenant;[34] and, where discretion is conferred on the executor or trustee to require security for the benefit of the remainderman, when he has acted and has transferred the possession to the life tenant without requiring security, he should not be surcharged because of the mere fact that in the exercise of his discretion he did not demand such security.[35]

Waiver; consent of remainderman. In general the remainderman may waive the giving of security by the life tenant[36] since the giving of security is for the purpose of preserving the estate in remainder and the life tenant and remainderman may, by united action, transfer absolute title.[37] There may be a waiver notwithstanding a statute provides for giving security.[38] So the testator who by will creates the life estate may waive security by testamentary direction that security shall not be required even though there is a statutory provision for security.[39] It seems, however, that it is not permissible to award the property to the life tenant without requiring adequate security merely because those apparently entitled to claim the remainder consent to such award, where the remainder is contingent so that other persons may ultimately be entitled to claim, or share in, the remainder.[40]

Effect of failure to give or require security. The fact that no bond has been given does not alter the rights of life tenant and remainderman,[41] as, for example, where the will creating the life estate directs that security shall not be required.[42] So the rights of the life tenant are not enlarged with regard to the use and management of the estate by the fact that no bond is required.[43]

Alternative appointment of trustee. In a case in which security is properly required, in some jurisdictions at least the court may and should appoint a trustee to hold the property and pay the income to the life tenant, if the latter is unable or refuses to give security,[44] and, under some statutes, the

Affording opportunity to give security

(1) Where the will provides for payment of money to the life tenant and contains no provision for a trustee, the court should not decree absolutely that the money should be held in trust for the life tenant, but should make the appointment of a trustee contingent on the life tenant's inability and failure to give security.—Tripp v. Krauth, 171 N.E. 919, 340 Ill. 11.

(2) In a case in which the life tenant was a nonresident of the state and a wanderer, the propriety of the appointment of a trustee was life tenant may either give a bond or have a trustee appointed.[45]

§ 135. Use of Property

The power of a life tenant in possession to invest and reinvest has been recognized. Subject to certain limitations as to consumable property, the life tenant may not encroach on the principal or corpus unless authority to do so is conferred by the instrument creating the estate.

While it has been said that personal property which is subject to a legal life estate cannot be reinvested by the person entitled to possession,[46] there is authority for the view that, where there is a life estate in personal property, there must always be a power to make it available according to the circumstances,[47] and the life tenant may, under proper restrictions, invest or reinvest money or its equivalent in order that his bequest may be more remunerative,[48] or, as stated in somewhat greater detail, he may convert one kind of property into another or change the character of the investments,[49] provided such acts are in accordance with prudent management and the value of the property as a whole is not diminished.[50] By the terms of the instrument creating the life estate it may become the duty of the life tenant to reinvest the proceeds of property sold pursuant to the terms of such instrument,[51] and the rule has been announced that, if the life tenant collects notes, debts, or the like, he should reinvest the proceeds.[52] The life tenant may have discretionary powers in determining the type of investment in the absence of restrictions or limitations imposed by the instrument creating the life estate.[53] Life tenant as trustee for remainderman see infra § 141.

Consumption and encroachment on corpus. Whether a person who has a life estate in personal property may convert such property to his own use depends to some extent on the kind and character of the property and the use to which it may be put as shown by the evidence in the particular case.[54] Ordinarily the life tenant is entitled to appropriate only the income and profits, and cannot encroach on the corpus of the estate,[55] at

Other statement

Life tenant must prudently manage personalty and invest proceeds of sale thereof so as not to diminish its value as a whole.—Wagnon v. Wagnon, Tex.Civ.App., 16 S.W.2d 366, 370, citing Corpus Juris and error refused.

53. Power to encroach on principal and exoneration from accounting

(1) Life tenant, who, under the will creating the life estate, had the possession and management of the property, with right to dispose of it for her comfort, maintenance, and support, free from any obligation to account to any one for what she might desire to use of either principal or income, was not subject to statutory limitations as to investment of trust funds.—In re Raplee's Will, 290 N.Y.S. 517, 160 Misc. 615.

(2) In such case the life tenant may exercise discretion in the selection of securities.—In re Raplee's Will, supra.

(3) In such case, however, the life tenant owed to the remainderman the duty, in respect of investments, to manage the unused principal prudently, and the test of the fidelity of the life tenant was not whether he invested in any particular class of securities, but rather whether he exercised the care and judgment which a prudent investor would have exercised in his own affairs.—In re Raplee's Will, supra.

(4) In such case the prudence required must be determined by conditions as they existed at time of investment, and fact that the judgment turned out to be wrong is not a showing that life tenant failed to exercise sound discretion.—In re Raplee's Will, supra.

Retention of securities

A will giving residue of testatrix' property to her daughter for life with provision for distribution thereof on death of daughter manifested intent of testatrix that corpus was to be delivered to daughter in kind without requiring daughter, as life tenant, to sell or convert corpus of the estate into securities legal for trust fund investment.—In re Watson's Estate, 5 N.Y.S.2d 416, 168 Misc. 135.

In Pennsylvania, in view of the general rule obtaining in Pennsylvania that personal property taken over by a life tenant under a bequest becomes, in effect, his individual estate and that he becomes a debtor to the remainder to the extent of the value of the property when taken over, set forth infra § 141, the property may be used or invested in the purchase of realty, mercantile adventures, or stock speculations.—Reiff's Appeal, 16 A. 636, 124 Pa. 145—In re Gillett's Estate, 197 A. 517, 130 Pa.Super. 309.

Gift of use of money

A gift of the use of money to a

least where the property is not consumed or worn out by use,[56] unless authorized to do so by the instrument or agreement creating the life estate.[57] Where the life tenant in possession is regarded as a debtor of the remainderman under rules stated infra § 141, according to some cases the life tenant may use the principal for his living and family expenses, without, however, affecting the right of remaindermen to receive the full amount of the principal on the death of the life tenant.[58]

Unless the instrument creating the estate manifests a contrary intention,[59] the donee or transferee of what purports to be a life estate in personal property of such a nature that its use necessarily results in its consumption may, under some circumstances, take absolute title,[60] and he may use such property without any accountability to the remainderman.[61] According to some cases, when such property is included in a general gift of personal property, to be specifically enjoyed, the rights of the remainderman are defeated as to all of such property which is consumed in the use intended to be made of it.[62] As sometimes expressed in the form of a general rule, a life estate in personal property gives the donee a right to consume such articles as cannot be enjoyed without consuming them,[63] and to wear out by use such as cannot be used without wearing out.[64] Under some circumstances, however, where the instrument creating the estate shows that the first taker is entitled only to a life interest notwithstanding the property is consumable, a sale may be directed and provision made for payment to the life tenant of the income from the proceeds and for securing the principal to the remainderman.[65]

The life tenant does not take an absolute estate in property which deteriorates in use, but which is not consumed or destroyed thereby.[66]

Where the property subject to the life estate is to be enjoyed in specie, a liability arises where the life tenant has converted chattels to unauthorized uses.[67] Where personal property which should properly be sold and the proceeds invested is left in the custody of the life tenant, he must account for all of the property received by him over and above the proportion to which he is entitled.[68]

As to creation of life estate in consumable property by will see the C.J.S. title Wills § 894, also 21 life tenant is a gift of interest and not of the corpus.—Quigley v. Quigley, 18 N.E.2d 136, 370 Ill. 151.

Exception with regard to support of children

Where the life tenant is the widow of testator and the remaindermen his children, and their means and those of the mother are insufficient to support and educate them in a proper manner, the widow may use a portion of the corpus of the estate for this purpose.—Wooten v. Reproductive property. Where the property is consumable but also reproductive, such as flocks and herds, the life tenant is entitled to the increase, as shown infra § 136, but, according to some cases, must keep up the original stock,[69] although, under some statutes, the life tenant does not have this obligation.[70]

Land and personalty. According to some cases, where the gift is of an estate consisting partly of real property and partly of personal property some of which is perishable, the perishable property does not belong absolutely to the life tenant, nor can it be sold.[71] Also it has been held that where land together with personal property which may be used in connection with the land is given to a person for life with remainder over, the tenant for life must preserve the estate with all its appurtenances in the same situation in which he received it, and he must keep the stock of cattle, provisions, and instruments of husbandry in the condition in which he received them.[72]

§ 136. Income, Profits, and Accretions

Income from the property subject to the life estate usually belongs to the life tenant, and he may also be entitled to profits and increase, although in some jurisdictions the general rule appears to favor the remainderman in regard to an increase in the value of the principal or corpus.

Unless a contrary restriction or limitation is duly imposed,[73] usually the life tenant is entitled to everything in the nature of income accruing during the existence of the life estate,[74] and any accumulation of income,[75] provided, according to some cases, the intact value of the corpus of the estate is not reduced.[76]

According to some cases, the profits[77] or in-

Basis of computation

(1) In the absence of a contrary intention expressed in the will creating the life estate, the life tenant is entitled only to income from residue of principal after the payment of debts, expenses, and specific legacies; accordingly, the life tenant was not prejudiced, where executor paid income from entire estate, and then charged against income interest paid to carry securities pending liquidation of testator's debt.—York v. Maryland Trust Co., 133 A. 128, 150 Md. 354, 46 A.L.R. 231.

(2) But under will giving widow "life use in one-third of all my property" after paying "just debts and funeral expenses," ascertaining property subject to life use before deducting legacies was proper.—In re Cannon's Estate, 151 A. 166, 111 Conn. 589.

In New York

(1) In a well considered case, in which, however, a testamentary trust was actually involved, the rule has been announced that, where will makes specific gift of property to life beneficiary direct, he is entitled to receive entire income, notwithstanding impairment of value of principal as it existed at date of death of testator may thereby result, whether such impairment is great or small.—In re Hilliard's Will, 299 N.Y.S. 788, 164 Misc. 677, affirmed In re Myers, 5 N.Y.S.2d 92, 254 App.Div. 879, reargument denied In re Hilliard's Estate, 7 N.Y.S.2d 111, 255 App.Div. 781.

(2) Rule applies where gift is of specified securities.—In re Hilliard's Will, supra.

(3) Where, however, subject matter of legal life estate was not given directly by terms of will, and award of current income to life beneficiary would result in impairment of principal, amortization fund must be set up from income to keep principal intact, unless testator has clearly expressed contrary intent.—In re Hilliard's Will, supra.

Profits accumulated through use of property

The estate of the life tenant is en-

crease[78] accruing during the life tenancy belongs to the life tenant, unless a contrary restriction or limitation is duly imposed.[79] As otherwise stated, if a fund is handed over to the life tenant, instead of paying him the income therefrom he may invest the fund, and the profits from such investment become his exclusive property, the remainderman being entitled only to a return of the original sum;[80] he may use the fund, and make all the profit on it he can, with due regard to its safety and protection.[81] According to some cases, however, an increase in the value of the principal or corpus during the life tenancy usually belongs to the remainderman,[82] and, under some circumstances, where, on failure of the life tenant to give the required security, the court appoints a trustee to take charge of the property, the enhanced value of the property belongs to the remainderman.[83] As to whether the enhanced value of personal property held in trust is income or capital as between life beneficiary and remainderman generally see the C.J.S. titles Trusts § 355, and Wills § 1031, also 21 C.J. p 1041 note 49, 65 C.J. p 857 note 28–p 860 note 58, 69 C.J. p 774 notes 31, 34.

When the income of a fund is given for life, as a general rule, the life tenant is not entitled to have the value of his life estate commuted and paid to him in gross, instead of the annual interest of the fund,[84] nor can he be compelled to take a gross sum in lieu thereof,[85] but if he elects to do so it may sometimes be permitted by the court,[86] and provision for this is sometimes made by statute.[87]

Where, under a will, one is entitled to a part of the net income of the estate during his life, he is entitled to have the estate kept intact for the purpose of receiving such part; and the executor of the estate cannot, at the instance of a remainderman, be compelled to sell the estate on the giving to the life tenant of "satisfactory assurance" of the payment to him of his portion of the income.[88] titled to profits accumulated through the use of the personal property in the life estate, in the absence of the testator's expression of a contrary intention in the will creating the life estate, and such profits pass to the heirs or devisees of the life tenant.—In re Wecker's Estate, 243 N.W. 642, 123 Neb. 504.

Partnership interest

(1) Life tenant was entitled to share of accumulated net profits in partnership as against remainderman, with interest on each year's accumulated undistributed net earnings.—Smith v. Sweetser, C.C.A.Ind., 19 F. 2d 974.

(2) In such case life tenant was entitled only to payment of share of undivided partnership profits rather than proportionate share of stock issued in lieu thereof and of deceased partner's interest in partnership.—Smith v. Sweetser, supra.

Where the life tenant in possession is regarded as a debtor to the remainderman to the extent of the value of the property when received by, or when distributed to, the life tenant under rules stated infra § 141, any increase in the value of the property during the life tenancy belongs to the life tenant.—In re Powell's Estate, 17 A.2d 391, 340 Pa. 404—Kirkpatrick's Estate, 131 A. 361, 284 Pa. 583—In re Strawbridge's Estate, 14 Pa.Dist. & Co. 703—21 C.J. p 1041 note 46.

83. In Pennsylvania

(1) The rule stated in the text has been applied where certain property came to the trustee in kind directly from the testator and remained in the trust unconverted at the date of the death of the life beneficiary, and where the appointment of the trustee was made at the request of all parties in interest.—In re Loewer's Estate, 106 A. 789, 263 Pa. 517.

(2) In a case in which a trustee was appointed pursuant to the Fiduciaries Act of 1917 § 23, 20 St. § 635, on refusal of the life tenant to give security, gains realized on the sale of principal assets were awarded to the remainderman.—In re Printzenhoff's Estate, 10 Pa.Dist. & Co. 335.

(3) In a case, however, in which reference was made to such statute, it was held that where the property received by the trustee consisted of tangible assets which were sold in continuing the business which had been carried on by the testator, profits earned in the business during the lifetime of the life beneficiary and undistributed at the time of his death belonged to his estate.—In re Chalfant's Estate, 144 A. 134, 294 Pa. 331.

(4) Where in such case the remainderman was a party to an agreement by virtue of which the court appointed a trustee and directed him to pay the net income to the life tenant during his life and, on his death, to pay the balance of the corpus to the remainderman, it was stated that the only effect of the agreement and the order was to waive the giving of security by the life tenant to protect the interest in remainder.—In re Chalfant's Estate, supra.

Interest. The interest on money,[89] and on bonds, notes, and other securities,[90] forming a part of the estate, belongs to the life tenant, but the right to such interest may be waived by him.[91]

The interest on a life estate in a residuary fund, where no time is prescribed for the commencement of the interest or enjoyment of such residue, should be estimated from the time of the death of the testator, on the amount of the residue as afterward ascertained.[92]

On the death of the life tenant interest is apportionable;[93] and this rule applies to the interest on municipal bonds and the bonds of private corporations.[94]

Increase of live stock. A person having a life estate in live stock is entitled to the natural increase produced during the continuance of his estate,[95] unless a contrary intention is shown by the instrument creating the life estate.[96]

Children of slaves. In most states the increase of slaves went with the mother to the owner of the remainder, and not to the person having the life estate,[97] unless a contrary intention appeared from the instrument creating the estate;[98] but in a few states such children were held to be the property of the life tenant.[99]

Increase in value of corporate stock. While the total proceeds of corporate shares of stock sold by the life tenant to the corporation which issued them have been regarded as corpus belonging to the remainderman, where the life tenant was entitled only to income,[1] and the rule has been announced that gains resulting from sales of corporate stock during the life tenancy are part of the estate in remainder,[2] in respect of corporate stock subject to a life estate which is called and redeemed by the corporation during the lifetime of the life tenant, it has been held that the life tenant is entitled to the difference between the value of the stock when the life tenancy began and the price at which the stock was redeemed, as earnings distributed to the life tenant,[3] but the interest in undistributed earnings held by the corporation as part of the corporate property, represented by each share, has been regarded as capital and not income, as between the life tenant and the remainderman.[4] Where the life tenant in possession is regarded as a debtor of the Increased value at date of death of life tenant

The increase in value of stock at the date of the death of the life tenant over the value at the date of testator's death, resulting from profits which have never been divided, distributed, or declared, belongs to remainderman to the extent of the value of the property when received by, or distributed to, the life tenant under the rules stated infra § 141, the increase in the value of shares of corporate stock which are subject to the life estate belongs to the life tenant who is not liable for the amount of such increase to the remainderman,[5] but, where, on the application of all interested persons, a trustee is appointed to hold the property on the life tenant's refusal to give security, the increase, during the life tenancy, in the value of corporate shares, which came to the trustee from the estate of the testator by whose will the life estate was created, belongs to the remainderman and not to the estate of the life tenant.[6] As to whether enhanced value of stock held in trust is income or capital as between life tenant and remainderman see C.J.S. titles Trusts § 355 and Wills § 1031, also 21 C.J. p 1041 note 49, 65 C.J. p 858 note 33, 69 C.J. p 774 note 31. As to the right, as between life tenant and remainderman, to exercise the right to subscribe for new stock, see Corporations § 201 e (2), and to receive dividends, see Corporations § 471.

§ 137. Alienability

Usually a life estate in personal property is alienable and may be disposed of by the life tenant, but not in such a way as to defeat the rights of the remainderman.

While it has been stated broadly that ordinarily personal property which is subject to a legal life estate with remainder over cannot be sold by the person entitled to possession,[7] as a general rule a life estate or interest in personal property is alienable and may be disposed of by the life tenant,[8] as in the case of similar estates in real property, considered supra §§ 33, 51, but not in a manner which will defeat the rights of the remainderman.[9] So usually the sale or assignment by the life tenant passes only his interest or estate,[10] notwithstanding the sale purports to pass the entire interest in the property,[11] and, according to some cases, a purchaser without notice from the life tenant takes subject the remainderman and not to the estate of the life tenant, in the absence of any provision showing a contrary intention in the will creating the life estate.

Shares of stock
(1) Under law of California holder of life estate in shares of corporate stock had no power to sell as trustee for remainderman.—Seymour v. National Biscuit Co., C.C.A.N.J., 107 F.2d 58, 126 A.L.R. 1288, certiorari denied National Biscuit Co. v. Seymour, 60 S.Ct. 590, 309 U.S. 665, 84 L.Ed. 1012.

(2) Under California law, that a beneficiary of a bequest of stock received a life estate by way of a residue, rather than by way of specific bequest, did not enlarge beneficiary's powers of sale, disposition, or consumption of stock, as respects beneficiary's right to deprive remaindermen of their rights in stock by its sale.—Seymour v. National Biscuit Co., supra.

(3) Where stock certificates represented a life interest only, full title to the stock could not be passed by the indorsement and delivery of such certificates by person who had only life interest therein.—Seymour v. National Biscuit Co., supra.

Effect of bill of sale
(1) In absence of power to convey a greater estate, a life tenant's bill of sale of personalty conveys merely his life estate therein.—Haydon v. Weltmer, 187 So. 772, 137 Fla. 130.

(2) Thus under a will giving some of property of testatrix to a specified person "for and during his natural life," and after his death to another "in fee simple," the life tenant had no power to dispose of any estate in personalty, and his bill of sale to third person conveyed only use of the property during his life.—Haydon v. Weltmer, supra.

11. Md.—Lark v. Linstead, 2 Md. 420.

to the rights of the remainderman,[12] although there is authority for the view that a purchaser in good faith for value acquires title, the life tenant holding the proceeds subject to the same limitations as applied to the holding of the property which was sold.[13] Even where the life tenant has the right to encroach on the principal for his personal use or for his personal support and maintenance, he may not make a gift to others of the property which is subject to the life estate, so as to defeat the rights of the remainderman.[14]

A sale by the life tenant which purports to pass the entire title does not terminate, or effect a forfeiture of, the life estate in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary.[15]

Where a life tenant wrongfully exchanges certain articles of personal property for property of a different kind, the executor who has continuing duties in regard to the estate may waive the tort and ratify the exchange if he considers it beneficial to the estate.[16]

§ 138. Executory or Future Interests

The common law now recognizes future and executory interests and executory limitations in respect of personal property.

It has been said that all future interests in personalty, whether vested or contingent, and whether preceded by a prior interest or not, are in their nature executory,[17] and fall under the rules by which that species of limitation is regulated,[18] and the common law now recognizes future and executory interests and executory limitations in respect of personal property.[19] A future interest in chattels real or personal may take effect in analogy to a re-

(2) In North Carolina, however, the general rule appears to be to the contrary at least as to certain instru-

mainder after a life estate limited therein and is then called a quasi remainder or simply a remainder, as shown infra § 139; it may take effect in defeasance of a complete disposition of the property, or it may take effect on the happening of some future contingency.[20]

The law favors the vesting of estates in personalty,[21] and the fact that there is, by the terms of the will creating the estate, an equitable conversion of the real estate into personalty does not affect the operation of the rule,[22] although the clear intent of the testator is controlling.[23]

§ 139. In Analogy to Remainders or Executory Devises

While originally the common law did not permit the creation of remainders or future interests in personal property, interests or estates of this nature may now be created, and, in the main, are governed by the principles applicable to similar estates in real property.

Although originally at common law there could be no interest by way of remainder created in personal property,[24] and a gift for life passed the entire interest, as shown supra § 133, it is now settled that future interests or quasi remainders operating in analogy to remainders or executory devises may be created,[25] according to the decisions actions inter vivos, in the absence of statutory modification.—Dowd v. Montgomery, 4 N.C. 198—Gilbert v. Murdock, 3 N.C. 182.

(3) So it has been held or recognized in that state that an attempted conveyance of chattels, with a reservation of a life estate to the grantor, is void as to the remainder, and has the effect of a reservation of the whole estate to the grantor.—Outlaw v. Taylor, 84 S.E. 811, 168 N.C. 511—Dail v. Jones, 85 N.C. 221—Morrow v. Williams, 14 N.C. 263.

(4) In an early case in Delaware the view apparently was taken that a gift of a chattel for life was an absolute gift except where the gift was in the form of an executory devise made at the time of the bequest of the life estate.—State v. Savin, 4 Del. 56, note.

Remainder after term

(1) A remainder over after an estate for years may be created.—Sherley v. Sherley, 232 S.W. 53, 192 Ky. 122.

(2) In the case of a transfer of shares of corporate stock by a man to his wife pursuant to a family arrangement that she would transfer such shares to their son when the latter should take over the management of the corporate business, the son had a remainder interest after an absolute estate for a term in the wife, contingent on the son's taking over such management; her estate terminated on the happening of such contingency, and her transfer of the shares to the son constituted performance of the family arrangement.—Clarke v. U.S., D.C.Pa., 5 F.Supp. 292, affirmed, C.C.A., U.S. v. Clarke, 69 F.2d 748, 94 A.L.R. 975, certiorari denied 55 S.Ct. 75, 295 U.S. 564, 79 L.Ed. 664.

No right of possession, control, and disposal

A gift of a right of property generally, unaccompanied with any right of possession control, and disposal, is not inconsistent with a limitation over on the happening of a future contingency.—Hooper v. Bradbury, 133 Mass. 303.

Life interest and remainder interest in same person

One having an interest as life beneficiary under a trust may also have a vested remainder in the corpus or principal of the trust.—In re Roth's Will, 255 N.Y.S. 307, 234 App.Div. 474—In re Meyer's Estate, 294 N.Y.S. 743, 162 Misc. 426—In re Foster's Will, 231 N.Y.S. 613, 133 Misc. 222, affirmed 235 N.Y.S. 803, 227 App.Div. 668.

Validity

The view has been taken that, where the provision of a trust agreement for the benefit of a life beneficiary was void, the remainders provided for in the agreement were also invalid, on the theory that there was no one in whom legal title could vest because under the law which the court regarded as applicable the trustee did not take legal title and the identity of the remaindermen could not be ascertained until the death of the person named as life in the cases listed below, in money[26] and other personalty.[27] In respect of a gift of personalty which, although impaired and worn out in the course of being used, is not useful merely as it is consumed, a quasi remainder may be operative,[28] and if the first taker dies leaving such property partly unconsumed the remainder over will take effect to the exclusion of the first taker's representatives.[29] In the case of a bequest creating a remainder after a life estate, the remainderman takes from the testator through the executor and after the life tenant, and does not take either from or through the life tenant.[30]

Language which would create a life estate and a reversion or remainder in lands may be sufficient to sever the title to personal property, giving it for life to one person, with remainder to others, on the same contingencies as land is granted.[31] By analogy, estates in remainder after a preceding estate are governed, in the main, by the principles which govern similar estates in real property.[32]

Under some circumstances, where a provision disposing of a remainder after a life estate is invalid, the property vests absolutely in the life tenant.[33] The destruction of the subject matter of a contingent remainder in personal property before the happening of the contingency defeats the remainder, and the fact that the property has been sold by the preceding tenant gives the remainderman no right to assert a claim against the purchaser where the destruction of the property was not the result of the sale.[34]

Vested or contingent. Whether a remainder in personal property is vested or contingent depends largely on the terms of the instrument creating the remainder when duly construed.[35] The possibility beneficiary.—Ross v. Ross, 243 N.Y.S. 418, 137 Misc. 795, reversed on other grounds in first action 253 N.Y.S. 871, 233 App.Div. 626, and affirmed in second action Hutchison v. Ross, 253 N.Y.S. 889, 233 App.Div. 516, affirmed 187 N.E. 65, 262 N.Y. 381, reargument denied 188 N.E. 102, 262 N.Y. 643, 89 A.L.R. 1023.

In Missouri

(1) The rule has been announced that future interests or quasi remainders, operating in analogy to remainders or executory devises, may be created either by deed or by will, without the intervention of a trustee. —Landers Inv. Co. v. Brown, 254 S.W. 14, 300 Mo. 348, 30 A.L.R. 908—21 C.J. p 1043 note 88.

(2) In an early case, however, it was held that there could be no limitation over, by a common-law conveyance, on the death of the first taker without heirs where the first taker had first been given an absolute interest in personal property. —Wilson v. Cockrill, 8 Mo. 1.

(3) A lease agreement for ninety-nine years which provided that rent should be paid to the lessor during her lifetime and thereafter to her daughter for the latter's lifetime, and then, after the deaths of the lessor and of her daughter, to the heirs of the lessor, created a remainder interest in the lessor's heirs; such heirs were those who would have been the heirs of the lessor if the daughter had predeceased the lessor.—Landers Inv. of a defeasance does not transform into a contingent remainder what would otherwise be a vested remainder.[36] A contingent remainder is an actual estate and has a possible, if not readily determinable, value; it is not a mere expectancy.[37]

The fact that the instrument creating the estate permits encroachment on the principal by the life tenant does not necessarily show that the remainderman has no equitable interest but merely creates a contingency with respect to an event and does not show lack of a present interest on the part of the remainderman.[38]

As to vested or contingent remainders in real property generally see supra §§ 69–75; and as to vested or contingent remainder created by deed see the C.J.S. title Deeds § 114, by will see the C.J.S. title Wills §§ 946–973, also 69 C.J. p 619 note 28–p 657 note 83–99.

After limitation to heirs or on failure of issue. Words which, if used concerning real estate, would create an estate tail, if used concerning chattels give an absolute interest, as shown supra § 25, and in general a remainder over is void and ineffective;[39] but remainders of chattel interests may be limited over on failure of issue at the death of the first taker,[40] the remainder sometimes being regarded as one after a life estate only.[41] A limitation over may take effect within the period allowed by the rule against perpetuities, the courts, where possible, giving this construction to the words used in the instrument involved.[42]

How created. In most jurisdictions quasi remainders in personal property may be created by deed, as shown in Deeds § 113, or by will, as shown in the C.J.S. title Wills § 914, also 69 C.J. p 583 note 39, or even by a bill of sale,[43] or, stated in more general terms, by written instrument,[44] but not by parol.[45]

While future interests or quasi remainders in personal property may be created without the intervention of a trustee,[46] there may be trusts in personal property, which may be created by parol in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, as shown in the C.J.S. title Trusts §§ 24, 35, also 21 C.J. p 1045 note 10, 69 C.J. p 235 note 38 et seq, p 254 note 51–p 256 note 66, and it has been held that a trust in remainder by parol may be proved or manifested in writing and will then be good.[47]

The rule as to acceleration applies to remainders in personal property as well as realty,[48] although the view has been expressed that the doctrine of the acceleration of contingent remainders has no application to estates wholly personal,[49] and in any event such doctrine cannot prevail over a provision of the will creating the remainder which shows a contrary intention.[50] It has been held that the transfer by the life tenant of what purports to constitute a greater estate than he possesses does not effect a forfeiture of the life estate, as shown supra § 137, and does not effect an acceleration of the estate in remainder.[51]

(3) Remainders in designated children of beneficiary after a trust for the life of the latter, established by the terms of a decree of court were vested, even though the trustee was authorized to use some of the principal for the support of the life beneficiary.—Pollack v. Pollack, 251 S. W. 715, 212 Mo.App. 233.

§ 140. Reversionary Interests

There may be reversionary interests or quasi reversions in personal property analogous to like estates in real property.

Future interests in personal property, which are analogous to reversions or remainders in real property, considered supra §§ 68–118, are sometimes called "reversionary interests"[52] or "quasi reversions,"[53] and may take effect in analogy to such interests in realty.[54] So, where there is a valid gift or transfer of personal property for life, there may be a reversionary interest in the donor or grantor or in persons entitled to claim under him after his death.[55] There may be an interest in reversion where there has been an ineffectual attempt to create a remainder by parol.[56] A valid future reversionary interest of this character cannot be created where the donor does not in fact part with the title.[57]

In case of a gift to a specified person, to have and to hold to her and to her issue forever, with provision that, in case of death of the donee without issue, the property should return to the surviving heirs of the donor, it was held that, on the death of the first taker during the lifetime of the donor, there could be no reverter since there was no one capable of taking under the description of the donor's surviving heirs.[58]

§ 141. Rights and Liabilities of Owner

While a life tenant in possession of personal property is not a trustee in the usual sense and in some jurisdictions is regarded as a debtor of the remainderman, the status of the life tenant is frequently termed that of trustee or quasi trustee. While not entitled to possession of the property during the existence of the life estate, the remainderman is entitled to receive the principal or corpus on the death of the life tenant.

As in the case of a life estate in real property, considered supra § 34, while a tenant for life of personal property is not a trustee in the ordinary sense,[59] the status of a life tenant in relation to the remainderman or reversioner has frequently been termed that of a trustee,[60] or such status has freapplicable statute, and that, in any event, a prior decision of the Ohio court of appeals, involving the same facts, was controlling.—West v. American Tel. & Tel. Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 121 F.2d 142, conforming to mandate 61 S.Ct. 179, 311 U.S. 223, 85 L.Ed. 139, 132 A.L.R. 956, reversing, C.C.A., 108 F.2d 347, certiorari granted 60 S.Ct. 979, two cases, 310 U.S. 618, 84 L.Ed. 1392.

Loan of property
A loan of personal property for life, with a stipulation that, on the death of the borrower, it shall return to the lender or his heirs, does not create a reversion, since no estate presently passes to the grantee, which is to return to the grantor.—Booth v. Terrell, supra.

In New York
(1) The life tenant has frequently been referred to as a trustee.—Leg-

quently been termed that of a quasi trustee.[61] He is a trustee in the sense that he must exercise reasonable precautions to preserve the property intact for transmission to the remainderman at the termination of the life estate,[62] and may not injure, or dispose of, the property to the detriment of the remainderman,[63] or do anything to impair the corpus of the estate,[64] or, as sometimes stated, only in the sense that he must have due regard for the rights of the remainderman;[65] but he differs from the trustee of a pure trust in that he may use the property for his exclusive benefit and take all the income and profits.[66] There is no such fiduciary relation between the life tenant and the remainderman as will prevent the former from acquiring from the remainderman the remainder interest.[67] It has been stated broadly that the trust obligation of a life tenant respecting realty is exactly the same as that of a life tenant respecting personalty,[68] and a life tenant in possession is under the duty not to waste the estate.[69] The intent of the testator as gathered from a will creating a life estate is to be given effect in determining the liability of the life tenant as custodian of the property and as trustee for the remainderman.[70] Notwithstanding the life tenant is given by the will broad powers as to the management of the property and has the right to encroach on principal, he owes a duty to the remainderman to manage prudently the unused principal.[71] A tenant for life of personal property may surrender the possession of such property to the remainderman and will not thereafter be liable for its safe-keeping.[72] Rights and duties of life tenant as to investments and reinvestments and as to income and profits are considered supra §§ 135, 136.

A life tenant who sells some of the personalty and invests the proceeds in other personalty holds such newly acquired personalty subject to the remainderman's interest;[73] but it has been held that, when an

(2) Where testator's personal property was turned over to widow and life tenant without security, widow became constructive trustee for benefit of remaindermen.—In re Read's Estate, 253 N.Y.S. 648, 141 Misc. 716.

(3) A life tenant with the right to encroach on principal has been regarded as a trustee.—In re Smith's Will, supra.

(4) But, in considering the status of such a life tenant, it has been said that he is not a trustee.—In re Victorin, 219 N.Y.S. 619, 128 Misc. 577.

Power of disposal or to encroach on principal

(1) Life tenant with power to encroach on principal held the property on an implied trust for the remainderman.—In re Curtis' Estate, 192 A. 13, 109 Vt. 44.

(2) A life tenant, with the power of disposal, is a trustee for the benefit of remaindermen, and, where husband was executor of the will of his wife and held a life interest in her estate, with power to use the whole or any portion thereof, the husband was, in effect, a trustee for the beneficiaries in remainder under the wife's will for such portion of the estate of the wife as the husband did not use or appropriate.—Trafton v. Bainbridge, 9 A.2d 306, 126 N.J.Eq. 448.

Resulting trust

Where the personal assets of an estate were taken possession of by the life tenant as such and invested in realty, this created a resulting, not a constructive, trust in the realty so purchased, in favor of the remaindermen. The life tenant was powerless to destroy, by any act of hers, the rights of the cestuis que trust to the corpus, not consumed in the using, of the trust estate, and the investment of it in realty clothed the remaindermen with the right to elect to take the realty, whether enhanced in value or not since the purchase, in lieu of the funds so invested, provided the rights of innocent purchasers for value and without notice have not intervened.—Small v. Hockinsmith, 48 So. 541, 158 Ala. 234.

Uniform Fiduciaries Act

A person who had a life estate in stock bequeathed under a will was a "fiduciary," within meaning of provision of uniform fiduciaries law defining quoted term, as respects relationship of such person to remaindermen.—Seymour v. executor sells personalty subject to a remainder and advances money from the proceeds to the life tenant, who buys land therewith, such life tenant may hold the land absolutely unaffected by the rights of remainderman.[74] When a life tenant converts personalty, the remainderman may impress a trust on it if otherwise it is likely to be lost.[75] Where the life tenant purchases real property with the funds received by him as life tenant, or with the proceeds of the sale by him of personal property which was subject to the life estate, and the remainderman does not question such purchase, it has been held that title to the real property should be placed in the life tenant for life with remainder to the person entitled thereto.[76] In the case of a gift over if the first taker should die before reaching a certain age, it has been held that, before reaching such age, the first taker may not remove the property beyond the state, against the wishes of the remainderman.[77]

The assent of a life tenant to an improper investment, by the executor of the will creating the life estate, of funds which are subject to the life estate is not binding on the remainderman.[78]

Usually at least it is not permissible to compute the value of the interest of a life tenant in a fund and deduct the gross sum arrived at from the amount of the fund for the purpose of making payment to the remainderman, without the life tenant's consent.[79]

In general the remainderman is not entitled to possession during the existence of the life estate,[80] and he cannot claim payment to himself of a fund in which another has a life estate, on his giving security to the tenant for life that he will be paid the interest on the fund as long as he lives.[81]

Where funds subject to a life estate are invested in real property and title is taken in the name of the remainderman, he may release and extinguish his interest in such funds as remainderman by a conveyance by deed absolute in form of such real estate to the life tenant.[82]

In an action by a remainderman, the holder of the fund is entitled to credit for sums paid by him to or for the remainderman after remainderman arrived at age, where such sums must have been paid in anticipation of the remainder.[83]

The life tenant may, by his laches, bar himself from asserting against the remainderman claims which would reduce the share of the remainderman.[84]

The right of one having only a contingent future interest, dependent on the divestiture of the right of the first taker to the entire interest by the latter's death without issue surviving, to a decree requiring an inventory has been denied.[85] As to requiring life tenant to furnish inventory or security for protection of remainderman, see supra § 134.

Life tenant as debtor in general. While it has been held that a life tenant in possession with the right to encroach on principal is not a debtor of the remainderman,[86] according to the view taken in some jurisdictions personal property received by the life tenant becomes, in effect, a part of his individual estate, and the relationship between him and the remainderman is that of debtor and creditor.[87]

In Nebraska the rule has been announced that personal property given, without restriction in a will, to a life tenant for his free use, becomes his own property to all intents and purposes, except that he is held to exercise reasonable precautions to preserve the full value of the property received by him for transmission to the remainderman at eral. On the death of the life tenant the remainderman is, as a general rule, entitled to receive the principal or corpus,[88] or the balance thereof in cases in which the life tenant was authorized to encroach on principal.[89] In respect of property which may or may not be consumed in use, such as work his death.—In re Wecker's Estate, 243 N.W. 642, 123 Neb. 504.

Taking possession without security

(1) A life tenant who takes possession without giving a bond is a debtor of the remainderman in the same manner as though a bond had been given.—In re Powell's Estate, 17 A.2d 391, 340 Pa. 404.

(2) The rule has been recognized where the testator, in the will creating the life estate, directed that the life tenant should not be required to give security.—In re Kirkpatrick's Estate, 131 A. 361, 284 Pa. 583.

Life tenant who gives security

A life tenant who takes possession, as such, on giving a bond to protect the remainderman in accordance with an applicable statute, is a debtor of the remainderman.—In re Litterle, 93 A. 935, 248 Pa. 95, affirming 23 Pa Dist. 471—Griffith's Estate, 26 Pa.Dist. & Co. 75—In re Strawbridge's Estate, 14 Pa.Dist. & Co. 703.

Extent of liability of life tenant

(1) A life tenant is responsible to remaindermen only for value of estate at date of distribution thereof to the life tenant as such.—In re Powell's Estate, 17 A.2d 391, 340 Pa. 404.

(2) Where life tenant was authorized to encroach on principal and the remaindermen were entitled to take what may "remain" at the time of the death of the life tenant, the life tenant was not obliged to account to remaindermen in respect of any particular shares of stock or other asset, the remainderman having an interest only in what might remain at the death of the life tenant of the amount at which the property subject to the life estate was valued when distributed to the life tenant.—In re Powell's Estate, supra.

Necessity for formal transfer

Where, when final account of executrix who was also a life tenant under will, was audited, balance was ordered distributed, whether in fact balance was distributed was immaterial as regards remaindermen's rights, and fact that life tenant did not have stock transferred on books of the company to her could not alter rights of the parties.—In re Powell's Estate, supra.

Alternative appointment of trustee

(1) In respect of cases governed by the law as it stood prior to the enactment of the Fiduciaries Act of 1917 § 23, 20 St. § 635, it was held that where, on the life tenant's declining to give security, as life tenant, the court, at the request of the life tenant, appointed a trustee, the latter stood in the same relation to the remainderman as the life tenant would have stood if the latter had given security and taken possession of the property, and the trustee so appointed was an insurer of the fund.—In re Weir's Estate, 96 A. 1086, 251 Pa. 499—In re Ertel's Estate, 19 Pa.Dist. & Co. 95.

(2) A distinction was recognized, however, in determining the status of the trustee, dependent on the question as to who sought the appointment of the trustee.—In re Kirkpatrick's Estate, 131 A. 361, 284 Pa. 583—Griffith's Estate, 26 Pa.Dist. & Co. 75—In re Ertel's Estate, supra.

(3) Where the appointment was made at the request both of the life tenant and remainderman, the trustee was not an insurer of the fund and could discharge his liability by turning over investments.—In re Ertel's Estate, supra.

(4) The appearance of remaindermen at an audit of executor's account and their acquiescence in the adjudication was a substantial joinder in the request of the life tenant for the appointment of a trustee within the meaning of the foregoing rule.—In re Ertel's Estate, supra.

(5) In cases to which the Fiduciaries Act of 1917 § 23 is applicable, the view has been taken that the responsibility of the trustee is only that of any general trustee regardless of what person sought the appointment of the trustee.—Griffith's Estate, supra—In re Printzenhoff's Estate, 10 Pa.Dist. & Co. 335.

(6) Trustee appointed under such statute is not an insurer of the trust fund and is liable only for due care as in the case of other trustees.—In re Printzenhoff's Estate, supra.

Other statement

The broad generalization has been made that a remainderman is entitled to receive only the thing originally given at the time appointed for the effectuation of the gift to him, plus such increase in value as may have occurred from natural causes during the postponement of the gift to him; this is the maximum of his valid demand, and he may receive less.—In re Densen's Estate, 296 N.Y.S. 567, 163 Misc. 232.

Title and right of possession

(1) On termination of life estate, the title and right of possession vest absolutely in the remainderman.

Md.—Crean v. McMahon, 68 A. 265, 106 Md. 507, 14 L.R.A.,N.S., 798.

(2) The view has been taken that, title being so vested, it is not necessary for the remainderman to bring a suit against the administrator of the life tenant, as such, to recover the fund.—Corney v. Corney, supra.

Fund invested in mortgage

Where trust funds had been invested in mortgage, remaindermen, after death of life beneficiary, were entitled to recover principal of fund with interest from life beneficiary's death and could enforce lien on land therefor.—Head v. Oldham Bank & Trust Co., 60 S.W.2d 621, 249 Ky. 292.

Replacement of household equipment

Where life tenant under will used corpus of estate to maintain and replace household equipment which was property of testator at time of his death, expenditures for such replacements should be treated as having been made in maintaining household equipment as a whole, and, after death of life tenant, all household equipment should be treated as part of corpus of estate of deceased.—Hutchinson's Estate v. Arnt, 4 N.E.2d 202, 210 Ind. 509, 108 A.L.R. 530, denying rehearing 1 N.E.2d 585, 210 Ind. 509, 108 A.L.R. 530.

Property of life tenant's separate estate

Note in separate estate of widow who had life interest in husband's estate, under his will, would be treated as part of residue of husband's estate where widow might have disposed of and used note for her own support instead of spending an equal amount out of corpus of husband's estate.—Hutchinson's Estate v. Arnt, supra.

stock, farming implements, and the like, if only an estate for life or other limited term is given and there is a gift over, the ulterior donee is entitled to such of the property as may remain at the termination of the preceding estate, in the condition in which it then is.[90]

Where personal property received by the life tenant is regarded, in effect, as part of his individual estate and he is treated as a debtor, the claim of the remainderman is payable out of the estate of the deceased life tenant,[91] but, where the relationship is not that of debtor and creditor, the remainderman is not required to present a claim as a creditor.[92]

A remainderman of personalty, where the property consists of a fund of money, or the equivalent, is entitled to interest on the amount of the fund from the date of the life tenant's death.[93] Usually, however, the remainderman is not entitled to interest which accrued prior to the death of the life tenant,[94] although he is entitled to accumulated income which has not been taken by the life tenant, where the instrument creating the life estate so provides.[95]

Depreciation, losses, expenses, and the like. It has been stated broadly that all to which a remainderman is entitled is the thing given in the state in which it is at the time when delivery to him was directed, without diminution in value because of the acts or neglects of the person to whom the intermediate use was given.[96] Generally the ordinary expense of the care and management of the fund during the existence of the life estate is payable by the life tenant.[97] Usually, however, the life tenant or his estate is not necessarily chargeable with losses to, or depreciation in the value of, the corpus or principal, occurring during the life tenancy,[98] and there is no liability for any loss or deterioration occurring from natural causes or without fault of the life tenant.[99] Where, however, property subject to the life estate which is received by the life

In Nebraska, the estate of the life tenant has been regarded as a debtor to the remainderman to the extent of the value of the property when received by the life tenant, in a case in which the value of the assets had increased as a result of the business ability of the life tenant.—In re Wecker's Estate, 243 N.W. 642, 123 Neb. 504.

Limitation on assertion of claim

In the case of a legal life estate, on the death of the life tenant, the remainderman must look alone to the estate of the life tenant or to his surety.—In re Young's Estate, 17 Pa. Dist. & Co. 745.

Failure to give security

Fact that life tenant failed to give a bond on taking over the property did not relieve her estate from liability to remainderman for value of property which the life tenant received, as such.—In re Gillett's Estate, 197 A. 517, 130 Pa.Super. 309.

Debt to remaindermen not to testator's estate

A decree that estate of deceased life tenant under will was indebted to testator's estate for value of property taken over by life tenant was erroneous, latter's estate being indebted to remaindermen under will.—In re Gillett's Estate, supra.

Retention of securities

(1) A life tenant with power to consume principal was not chargeable with any loss resulting from the depreciation in the value of shares of corporate stock retained by her as life tenant.—In re Victorin, 219 N.Y.S. 619, 128 Misc. 577.

(2) A testator has the right to absolve the life tenant from responsibility incurred by reason of depreciation or loss in the retention of securities received by the life tenant as a part of the corpus of the life estate when such loss is not due to willful negligence, neglect, or conversion.—In re Watson's Estate, 5 N.Y.S.2d 416, 168 Misc. 135.

(3) Whether life tenant who was also executrix under will was liable to surcharge for depreciation in securities received from estate was governed by whether life tenant had acted in good faith and exercised that degree of care and diligence in the management of the estate as would a reasonably careful and prudent person of ordinary intelligence, circumstanced as was the life tenant.—In re Watson's Estate, supra.

(4) Under will giving residue of estate to daughter of testatrix for life, disposal of speculative securities received by life tenant as part of corpus of estate was within discretion of life tenant, and hence life tenant was not subject to surcharge because of error of judgment in retaining securities in absence of bad faith or negligence on her part.—In re Watson's Estate, supra.

Question as to deterioration is determined, not by whether each article that went to make up the estate as a whole is in the same con-

tenant is regarded, in effect, as part of his individual estate, and he is regarded as a debtor of the remainderman to the extent of the value of the property when received by the life tenant, the latter, or his estate, is chargeable with losses to the corpus or principal occurring during the life tenancy,[1] and is not entitled to reimbursement for his expenses in caring for the property,[2] or for the expenses of settling the estate of deceased life tenant.[3]

It has been held that an income tax is chargeable against principal in so far as it is imposed on profits made by the estate which are not distributed or distributable to the life beneficiary as income,[4] but a tax on personal property due during the life tenancy is usually payable by the life tenant,[5] although the rule is otherwise if the instrument creating the life estate shows a contrary intention.[6]

A remainderman of personalty who relieves the personalty from execution, takes it into possession, and is compelled by the court to relinquish it, may be allowed interest and expenses.[7]

As to expenses, deterioration, and losses in the case of life estate in real property, see supra § 49. As to loss or depreciation affecting investments of trust funds see the C.J.S. titles Trusts §§ 334–337, also 65 C.J. p 819 note 85–p 824 note 54, Wills § 1037, also 69 C.J. p 792 notes 35–37.

§ 142. Transfer of Interest

Usually a remainder in personal property may be disposed of by the remainderman, although in the case of a contingent remainder it may be necessary to resort to equity to enforce an assignment.

A vested remainder in personal property may, as a general rule, be disposed of by the person entitled thereto during the continuance of the preceding estate.[8] A vested interest in remainder, which is also defeasible, cannot be disposed of or transferred, dition as to preservation, value, and productiveness as at the death of the testator, but whether the estate as a whole is in such condition.—Brooks v. Brooks, 12 S.C. 422.

1. In Pennsylvania

(1) Loss due to depreciation of assets must be borne by the estate of the life tenant and may not be deducted from the original value of the property in determining the amount due to the remainderman.—In re Weir's Estate, 96 A. 1086, 251 Pa. 499—In re Strawbridge's Estate, 14 Pa.Dist. & Co. 703.

(2) In a case arising prior to the enactment of Fiduciaries Act of 1917 § 23, 20 St. § 635, it was held that, where a trustee was appointed at the request of the life tenant on the latter's declining to give security, the trustee, on the death of the life tenant, was bound to account to the remainderman for the corpus at its original value, without taking credit for the amount invested by him in a bond and mortgage which had depreciated in value.—In re Weir's Estate, supra.

(3) It was held that in such case the only credit to which the trustee was entitled was for expenses necessarily incident to the filing of his account.—In re Weir's Estate, supra.

(4) In this regard, the view was taken that in such case the trustee was in the same position that the life tenant or the estate of the latter would have been if the life tenant had taken possession.—In re Weir's Estate, supra.

(5) But in the case of a trustee appointed under such act, on refusal of the trustee to give security, such charges as usually are made against principal in the administration and distribution of a trust are deductible.—In re Printzenhoff's Estate, 10 Pa.Dist. & Co. 335.

Alternative appointment of trustee

(1) In a case arising prior to the enactment of the Fiduciaries Act of 1917 § 23, 20 St. § 635, it was held that, where a trustee was appointed at the request of the life tenant on the latter's declining to give security, the trustee, on the death of the life tenant, was not entitled to a credit for the expense of caring for the fund, since the trustee was in the same position as the life tenant or the latter's estate would have been if the life tenant had taken possession of the property.—In re Weir's Estate, 96 A. 1086, 251 Pa. 499.

(2) Where, however, a trustee is appointed under such statute on the life tenant's refusal to give security, the fund is liable for expenses of administration.—Printzenhoff's Estate, 10 Pa.Dist. & Co. 335.

Apportionment

(1) The income of the life tenant was chargeable with the whole tax for the tax year in which he died notwithstanding he died less than a month after the tax was assessed, where liability for the tax was determined by conditions existing on the date of assessment.—Holmes v Taber, 9 Allen, Mass., 246.

Vested interest in nature of equitable remainder

(1) One who has a vested interest in personal property in the nature of an equitable remainder subject to a life estate or interest may transfer and assign the same.—Swett v. Thompson, 21 N.E. 382, 149 Mass. 302.

(2) A mortgage of such vested interest containing the usual covenants operates as an equitable assignment which the mortgagee may enforce after the life tenant's death. Ind.—Thurston v. Buxton, 34 N.E. 2d 549.
Mass.—Swett v. Thompson, supra.

Property not included

(1) Assignment by testator's aunts, as remaindermen under insured's will, of their interest in insured's estate, did not include com-

however, so as to pass an absolute title,[9] but the title of the transferee is taken subject to the defeasance,[10] and such title is defeated where the remainderman dies before the happening of the event on which his enjoyment of the property and the vesting of absolute title depends.[11]

While a contingent remainder is, under some statutes, alienable,[12] and may be mortgaged by the remainderman before the death of the life tenant,[13] in accordance with general rules stated in Assignments §§ 11, 12, such an interest was not assignable or alienable at common law,[14] and, it has been held, is not rendered alienable by a statute subjecting all interests in land to conveyance.[15] In accordance with rules stated in Assignments §§ 11, 12, contingent interests in personal property are assignable in equity,[16] and in jurisdictions in which the courts do not recognize a mortgage of a contingent remainder in personalty, it may be upheld by equity as a valid assignment of such interest.[17] The death of the remainderman before the happening of the contingency on which the vesting of his interest depended defeats the rights of one to whom the remainderman had pledged his interest.[18]

While it has been held that the inadequacy of the price paid for a remainder interest in personal property is not in itself sufficient to invalidate the assignee's title,[19] according to some cases, a sale of a remainder will be viewed with suspicion in a court of equity, and relieved against if advantage is taken of the vendor's necessities by buying at a great undervalue,[20] and the assignment of a contingent remainder or interest will not be enforced in equity against the will of the assignor, unless supported by a valuable, as distinguished from a good, consideration.[21]

A contract for the sale of a remainder may contemplate valuation of the interest at the date of final distribution of the estate, although made during the life of the life tenant.[22]

The fact that the instrument creating the estate permits encroachment on the principal by the life tenant does not necessarily show that the remainderman has no assignable interest.[23]

Remainders in personalty may be sold at a sheriff's sale,[24] and a sale of personal property may be made by the court where the remainder interest is represented by the executor of the creator of the remainder.[25]

Sale, conveyance, or mortgage of remainder in real property in general is considered supra §§ 87–90; descent or distribution of reversions or remainders, in Descent and Distribution § 18; whether future or contingent estates, interests, or possibilities may be bequeathed or devised, in the C.J.S. title Wills § 85, also 68 C.J. p 498 note 86–p 500 note 6; and whether expectant or future interests muted value of war risk insurance payable to estate on death of life beneficiary.—In re Fisher's Estate, 153 A. 736, 302 Pa. 516.

(2) Assignment of interest in insured's estate, "payable now or . . hereafter," where made to enable assignee to settle another estate, did not include interest of assignors as remaindermen under will of insured in commuted value of war risk insurance.—In re Fisher's Estate, supra.

Statutory regulation

Vested remainders in personal property may be transferred even if by statute the beneficiary to receive the income of personal property held in trust is not permitted to transfer it.—Bergmann v. Lord, 86 N.E. 828, 194 N.Y. 70, affirming 107 N.Y.S. 1121, 122 App.Div. 921.

Rights under will

(1) Purported mortgage of remainderman's contingent interest in testator's estate after termination of life estate in trust was sufficient to transfer defeasible title to such interest to mortgagee and his assignee as security for mortgagor's indebtedness to them and operative as defeasible assignment, enforceable in equity to extent of such indebtedness in distribution of mortgagor's share of trust estate, subject to paramount equities.—Miller v. Hirschmann, 183 A. 259, 170 Md. 145.

(2) Petition to annul, for fraud, mortgage of remainderman's contingent interest in testator's estate after life tenant's death was properly dismissed as to original mortgagee, who agreed to loan mortgagor stated sum on such security, paid residue of loan after satisfaction of judgment against mortgagor from proceeds thereof to mortgagor or his attorney, was made party to equity cause, in which trust estate was being administered, with mortgagor's consent, and assigned his claim and security to another before life tenant's death, no fraud by such mortgagee being established.—Miller v. under will or by succession pass to a trustee in bankruptcy, in Bankruptcy § 180.

Mode of transfer. Remainders in personal property may be transferred or assigned by a writing,[26] but since delivery cannot be made during the continuance of the preceding estate such disposition cannot be made by parol.[27]

In the transfer of shares of corporate stock from the remainderman to the life tenant for a consideration, no delivery is necessary,[28] and, in view of statutory provisions abolishing the use of seals on private contracts, a seal is not required on an instrument making such transfer.[29]

§ 143. Merger

It has been laid down broadly that the doctrine of merger primarily has no application to personal property, although it has been said that the term "merger" is applicable to rights other than rights in land.

While it has been said that with respect to personalty the doctrine of merger, considered supra §§ 123–131, with regard to real property, primarily has no application,[30] it has been stated broadly that the term "merger" is applicable to rights other than such as exist in land.[31]

a. Right to relief, and form of remedy, at law
b. Right to relief, and form of remedy, in equity
c. Time to sue and limitations
d. Parties
e. Pleading
f. Evidence
g. Trial or hearing and relief

a. Right to Relief, and Form of Remedy, at Law

One who has a remainder interest in personal property is entitled to avail himself of legal remedies, if otherwise applicable, to enforce his rights.

The nature of the quasi remainderman's right as a legal vested right has frequently been recognized, and he is entitled to legal remedies.[32] A remainder interest in personal property may be recovered either in an action on the case,[33] or in an action of account.[34]

In case of a sale of a chattel by the life tenant, it has been stated broadly that the remainderman may maintain an action for damages against any person who has the chattels in possession, or who has had them in possession since the death of the life tenant, or has done any act injurious to the estate in remainder during the continuance of the life estate.[35] So, where personal property has been wrongfully sold by the life tenant, the remainderman may, after the life tenant's death, elect to proceed for the recovery of the property itself or for its value.[36]

As to actions by life tenant generally see supra § 133.

b. Right to Relief, and Form of Remedy, in Equity

Courts of equity will intervene in a proper case to protect or preserve remainder or future interests in personal property, the propriety of a particular remedy depending on the facts of the case presented.

A court of equity has jurisdiction to entertain a bill to protect the rights of one who has a remainder interest,[37] or who has some contingent future interest,[38] when the equities are in his favor.[39] According to some cases, the fact that the life tenant or other first taker is regarded as a trustee for the person entitled to the remainder or executory interest is the ground for jurisdiction of courts of equity of suits by such persons.[40]

(2) Where life tenant placed securities in trust providing for payment of income to remaindermen and life tenant and by subsequent agreement authorized trustees to lend remaindermen an advancement deductible from their respective interests in life tenant's estate, remaindermen's acceptance of advancement would not operate to transfer remaindermen's interest in securities to life tenant.—In re Franz' Estate, supra.

A person who has a vested remainder is entitled to resort to equity by a bill quia timet, or other appropriate proceeding, for the protection of his interest when the property in the hands of a life tenant is in danger of loss, deterioration, or injury,[41] or when the life tenant is claiming a right to the property adverse to that of the remainderman.[42]

The sale of personal property by a life tenant to a person outside of the state, where it is not shown that the sale was of more than the life interest or was fraudulently made or that any injury to the remainderman has resulted therefrom, is not of itself ground for equitable relief.[43] It has been held that equitable relief for the protection of the remainderman's interest cannot be accorded where the life tenant is a nonresident and the property is not within the jurisdiction of the court.[44] If the property has already been removed beyond the state, equity will not usually interfere to redress the wrong until the remainderman's right to possession has accrued.[45] The right of one entitled to a contingent remainder or interest to resort to equity for the preservation of the property before his rights have become vested is affected by the degree of probability as to the vesting of the contingent interest.[46]

Where the delivery of specific chattels is desired and the circumstances are such that the legal remedy by an action for damages would be inadequate, equity may decree specific delivery.[47]

In respect of a sale made by a life tenant where the property was removed from the state, it has been held that the estate of the life tenant is primarily liable in a suit brought after the death of the life tenant to enforce the rights of the remainderman.[48]

As to actions by life tenant generally see supra § 133.

Injunction. An injunction may be granted in a proper case to protect an estate in remainder.[49] Thus equity may enjoin a life tenant of personal property from removing it out of the state,[50] but not unless good grounds are shown for believing that it is his intention to do so.[51]

Accounting. A life tenant in possession,[52] or, after his death, his legal representative,[53] may be

Otherwise stated

Persons who have an interest in personal property in the nature of a remainder may maintain a suit to protect and preserve their interests against life tenant, or against one to whom property has been transferred by gift, or who has received it under circumstances amounting to fraud on the rights of remaindermen, where transferee is not a bona fide purchaser.—Abbott v. Wagner, supra.

Under its jurisdiction to direct, control, conduct, and settle accounts of testamentary trustees, the surrogate's court has required a life tenant in possession of property under will to account on application of infant remainderman's general guardian, on the theory that life tenant was a "trustee" during continuance of life estate, in view of Surrogate's Court Act § 314 subd 6.—In re Smith's Will, 11 N.Y.S.2d 945, 170 Misc. 556.

under the duty to account to the remainderman under certain circumstances, and, in the case of a wrongful disposal of personal property, both a grantee of the life tenant who took with knowledge[54] and the personal representative of the life tenant[55] may be required to account.

It has been held that a life tenant with power to encroach on principal cannot be required to account to one entitled to the remainder, in the absence of allegation of waste, improvidence, fraud, or unauthorized use or disposal.[56] If the life tenant had the power to encroach on, or dispose of, principal, the duty, if any, of his personal representative to account does not extend beyond the principal unused when the life tenant died.[57] As to right to income, profits, and accretions as between life tenant and remainderman see supra § 136, and as to whether losses, depreciation, or expenses are chargeable to life tenant or remainderman see supra § 141.

Sequestration and ne exeat. In some jurisdictions a writ of sequestration may be issued at the instance of a remainderman or reversioner to prevent a life tenant of personal property from removing it from the state,[58] provided the writ states sufficient facts to enable the court to see that the fear of such removal is well founded,[59] although in certain other jurisdictions the writ will not be issued in the absence of a statute authorizing its issue.[60] When personal property has already been removed, the court will not order the sequestration of other property of the life tenant.[61]

If the property subject to a life estate has already been removed the tenant himself may in some jurisdictions be arrested under a writ of ne exeat and required to give bond not to leave the state and to abide the judgment of the court,[62] and in other jurisdictions relief will be granted by a bill quia timet only.[63]

Receiver. A receiver may be appointed in a proper case to take custody of personal property subject to a life estate in order to protect the rights of the remainderman or reversioner,[64] as, for example, on the conversion by a life tenant of personal property into money with danger that the fund may be lost,[65] or when a life tenant threatens to remove personal property from the state or to sell it to another with a view to its removal.[66]

c. Time to Sue and Limitations

Generally a statute of limitations does not begin to run against the right to recover a remainder interest until the termination of a life estate, but certain actions to protect rights of, or to redress injuries to, the remainderman may be brought during the lifetime of the life tenant.

In the case of a bequest subject to a life estate the statute of limitations does not begin to run against the right of a legatee to recover his remainder interest,[67] or against the right of his as-

Suit against surviving partner

Action by the administrators with will annexed of testator by whose will the life estate was created was not barred by any statute of limitation, where the relief sought was an accounting by the surviving member of a partnership of which the testator was a member and of another partnership of which the life tenant was a member, and where plaintiffs had procured their appointment as administrators and had brought the action within a reasonable time after the death of the life tenant.—Thompson v. Flynn, 27 P.-2d 505, 95 Mont. 484.

Property sold by life tenant

Where property was sold by the life tenant pursuant to authority conferred by the will creating the life estate, the statute of limitation did not commence to run against the claim of the remainderman to recover the proceeds before the death of the life tenant, notwithstanding the latter had not reinvested such proceeds pursuant to direction in the will and had not charged herself with the proceeds in any of the several settlements made by her.—Shutt's Adm'r v. Shutt's Adm'r, 232 S.W. 405, 192 Ky. 98.

signee[68] until the termination of the life estate. So it has been held that the remainderman is not required to bring a suit in equity to compel a delivery to him of the property by a purchaser from the life tenant until the accrual of the cause of action by the termination of the life estate,[69] but, according to some cases, in the case of a sale of personal property by a life tenant, the statute of limitations begins to run against the remainderman from the date of sale.[70] It has also been held, in a suit to establish the rights of persons who were given a vested remainder after a trust for life, based on an alleged conspiracy to defraud and cheat the remaindermen by defeating the trust during the lifetime of the remaindermen, that the running of the applicable statute was not postponed until the death of the life beneficiary.[71]

A statute of limitations applicable to actions by creditors of deceased persons to recover on accounts, debts, or claims does not apply to a suit by the remainderman to establish his rights under the will creating the life estate and remainder, brought after the death of the life tenant,[72] nor does a statute of limitations applicable to actions against the personal representative of deceased person apply to such action by the remainderman, where no judgment or decree against the representative of deceased life tenant is sought.[73] It seems that in some jurisdictions there is no statute of limitations applicable to an action by the remainderman against the life tenant for a general accounting.[74]

What constitutes laches in suits to enforce the rights of remaindermen brought after the death of the life tenant depends on the facts of the particular case.[75]

A suit to protect the rights of the remainderman is not necessarily premature because brought in the lifetime of the life tenant,[76] and it has been held that the owner of a reversionary interest in personal property may, during the continuance of the preceding estate, maintain an action for the destruction of, or serious injury to, such interest.[77] On the other hand, during the continuance of the life estate, a remainderman cannot, although in possession, maintain an action of trover against a wrongdoer for the conversion of personal property.[78] Where a tenant pur autre vie of personal property hires it out for a certain period and the life estate terminates during this period, the remainderman may bring detinue against the person in actual possession or wait until the hiring expires and the property is returned to its former possessor,[79] but, prior to the expiration of the period of hiring, he may not bring the action against the tenant pur autre vie who is not in possession, in the absence of any showing that the latter had parted with the property wrongfully or fraudulently.[80] As to actions against life tenant in general see supra subdivisions a and b of this section.

d. Parties

Who are necessary or proper parties to actions to protect or enforce rights or claims of remaindermen depends on the nature of the action and the nature and extent of the rights asserted or invaded.

(2) In the case of a life estate created by will, a suit by the administrators with will annexed against a surviving partner of the testator for an accounting was not barred by laches, notwithstanding it was not brought until after the death of the life tenant who survived the testator for twenty-six years.—Thompson v. Flynn, 27 P.2d 505, 95 Mont. 484.

Suit not affecting possession or other rights of life tenant
Where the life tenant had created a trust for her life by transferring to trustees the property which was subject to the life estate, and the life tenant and several of the remaindermen denied the right of one of the remaindermen to any property in the possession of the trustee, a suit by the remainderman whose rights were so denied was not premature, although it was brought during the lifetime of the life tenant, where the suit did not involve nor seek to affect, enjoyment of possession or other rights of the life tenant, but merely sought to protect the property from spoliation and loss by requiring an accounting and other relief.—Buder v. Franz, supra.

80. Ala.—Walker v. Fenner, supra.

Where in a suit by a remainderman to establish his rights a sale of the property is prayed for, all remaindermen should be made parties.[81] So, also, where personal property has been wrongfully disposed of by the preceding tenant and a remainderman sues to recover his interest in the proceeds, all of the remaindermen interested in the fund must be made parties,[82] but any remaindermen who joined in the sale, and thereby divested themselves of their interest in the property, need not be joined.[83] A bill for the sequestration of personal property to prevent its removal from the state, which does not seek a final adjudication of the rights of the parties, but only to have the property secured, may be maintained by one remainderman without making another, who is tenant in common with him, a party.[84] Where plaintiffs are asserting in equity a common right of remaindermen to have their interest declared in described property and to have the property protected against waste, it has been held that life tenant, representatives of deceased life tenants, and persons in possession of the property were proper parties defendant.[85]

The remainderman and not the personal representative of the life tenant is the proper party to sue for money loaned from the estate to a third person by the life tenant.[86]

It had been held that the life tenant is not a necessary party to a suit by persons holding a remainder interest against a transferee of the life tenant to establish rights of remainderman, based on a wrongful transfer by the life tenant in violation of plaintiffs' rights.[87]

e. Pleading

In an action to enforce rights of a remainderman, plaintiff's pleading must allege such facts, and only such facts, as are necessary to show the existence of a cause of action.

In an action to recover a remainder interest in personal property after the death of the life tenant every article sought to be recovered need not be specifically described in plaintiff's pleading.[88] Under a statute providing that personal property shall be forfeited to the reversioner on its removal out of the state by a tenant in dower without the reversioner's consent, the declaration must allege that the removal was without his consent.[89]

f. Evidence

Parties asserting claims of remaindermen against a life tenant or the latter's estate have the burden of proving facts essential to the existence of liability. The admissibility and sufficiency of evidence depends on the application of general rules and on the facts of the case in controversy.

Where a certain amount under a will is paid a life tenant in personal property and not in money, the remaindermen have the burden of proof that the life tenant's estate is liable therefor.[90] In cases in which the life tenant had power to encroach on, or dispose of, principal, if no part of the principal can be found after his death, there is a presumption that he used the whole principal,[91] and the burden of proof is on those who allege the contrary.[92] So persons who seek to impose surcharges against the estate of the life tenant in respect of depreciation in the value of investments made by the life tenant have the burden of proving facts which would authorize such surcharges,[93] and the remainderman has the burden of proving deterioration for which the life tenant might be responsible.[94]

No property found by life tenant's representative

Burden was on plaintiff, who sought to charge the executor of the life tenant in an action in which it was alleged in the complaint that the life tenant did not consume, or dispose of, any of the property, to show that some part of the property passed to defendant executor or was in his possession, where the executor alleged that he could not find any part of the property.—Seaward v. Davis, 91 N.E. 1107, 198 N.Y. 415, modifying 117 N.Y.S. 468, 133 App. Div. 191.

93. Life tenant having broad powers as to management and disposal

(1) Persons who seek to impose surcharges against estate of life tenant, in respect of the depreciation in the value of investments made by the life tenant who, under the will creating the life tenancy, had broad powers as to the management and disposal of the property, had the burden to sustain their contention and to prove by fair preponderance of evidence that each investment which they criticized was not such as a prudent person would purchase.—In re Raplee's Will, 290 N.Y.S. 517, 160 Misc. 615.

g. Trial or Hearing and Relief

In a suit in equity to protect the rights of a remainderman, the court may make such orders as are necessary and appropriate to safeguard his interests.

In a suit in equity to protect the rights of a remainderman, the court has power to make such orders and to require such security as may be necessary to protect and safeguard the interests of the remainderman.[97] It has been held that, when the specific property bequeathed has been disposed of by the life tenant in exchange for other property, equity will not require security for the delivery of property, received on the exchange, to the remainderman at the expiration of the life estate.[98]

A decree in a suit in equity to protect the rights of the remainderman against a third person, for the full value of the property vests a good title in such person and prevents or estops the remainderman from suing for, or recovering, the property.[99]

In General

The sense in which this word is used, and the particular idea intended to be expressed by its use, must be determined by the subject matter under consideration, together with the context of the instrument.[19] When properly and correctly used, in oral communications or written instruments, it is a word selected to express the mind or judgment of the speaker or writer on the particular subject under consideration.[20] Either as a noun or a verb, the word implies computation or calculation,[21] reasonable approximation,[22] something more than a mere guess or conjecture;[23] but does not pretend to be based on absolute calculations,[24] for it is merely an exercise of judgment in determining the amount, importance, or magnitude of things with their other exterior relations,[25] and, in fact, precludes the idea of accuracy.[26] It has no more certainty than the terms "about" or "more or less,"[27] and, under particular circumstances, may be advisory only.[28] As used in some statutes, the term implies the performance of certain statutory requirements, and is to be distinguished from the tentative and preliminary estimates on which the statutory estimate is based.[29]

§ 1. Terminology

a. "Estoppel"
b. Other terms

a. "Estoppel"

An "estoppel" is a bar which precludes a person from denying the truth of a fact which has become settled in contemplation of law.

In the broad sense of the term, "estoppel" is a bar which precludes a person from denying the truth of a fact which has in contemplation of law become settled by the acts and proceedings of judicial or legislative officers, or by the act of the party himself, either by conventional writing or by representations, express or implied, in pais.[1] To use

When estoppel arises

(1) An "estoppel" arises where a man is concluded and forbidden by law to speak against his own act or deed; yea, even though it is to say the truth.—Termes de la Ley, quoted in New Jersey Suburban Water Co. v. Town of Harrison, 3 A.2d 623, 122 N.J.Law 189, reversing 1 A.2d 61, 120 N.J.Law 546—21 C.J. p 1059 note 1 [b] (3).

Estoppel as to rules of law

Estoppels preclude the assertion of facts, not law.

N.C.—Moore v. Willis, 9 N.C. 555.

the quaint language of Lord Coke, it is so called "because a man's owne act or acceptance stoppeth or closeth up his mouth to alleage or plead the truth."[2] However, this statement does not mean that the person is precluded from alleging the truth, as truth, but because what he now assumes to be true is something inconsistent with his former position.[3]

The purpose of estoppels is to prevent inconsistency and fraud resulting in injustice.[4]

Distinctions. The principle of estoppel is sometimes spoken of as a rule of evidence.[5] However, it is not such;[6] estoppels differ from evidence in that estoppels are received as conclusive and preclude all inquiry into the merits of the title, while evidence is merely the medium of establishing facts which do exist or have existed.[7]

The distinction between laches and estoppel is treated in Equity § 112. Abandonment distinguished see Abandonment § 2 b (8).

b. Other Terms

Various other terms have been employed in connection with estoppel such as "estoppel at common law," "estoppel by laches," "technical estoppel," and "title by estoppel."

In connection with estoppel certain terms have been employed, such as "estoppel by contract" see infra §§ 55–58, "estoppel by deed" see infra §§ 10–54, "estoppel by misrepresentation" see §§ 59–106 infra, "estoppel by record" see infra §§ 4–9, and various other terms.[8]

"Estoppel by laches." A neglect to do something which one should do or to seek to enforce a right at a proper time has been termed "estoppel by laches."[9]

"Technical estoppel." "Technical estoppels" are those which arise from matter of record or the deed of the party estopped,[10] and sometimes conclude the party without any reference to the moral qualities of his conduct.[11]

"Title by estoppel." Where a person without title, having conveyed with warranty, subsequently acquires the title, it inures to the benefit of the grantee, who is said to acquire the title by estoppel.[12]

Estoppel as conclusion of law
Estoppel is conclusion of law which must be based on facts found. —Skeen v. Van Sickle, 15 P.2d 344, 80 Utah 419.

§ 2. Classification

Estoppel is by matter of record, by matter in writing, and by matter in pais.

It is commonly stated that there are three kinds of estoppel, namely, by matter of record, by matter in writing, and by matter in pais.[13] However, as is shown infra §§ 107–129, there are also certain legal bars which have the same effect as an estoppel and yet are not strictly such, which have been termed quasi estoppels.

§ 3. Odiousness of Estoppels

While estoppels have not been viewed with favor, nevertheless the wisdom and justice of the principle of estoppel are generally recognized.

It is commonly stated in many decisions that estoppels are odious and are not favored in law because they exclude the truth.[14] Nevertheless, the wisdom and justice of the principle of estoppel, especially estoppel in pais, see infra § 63, are generally recognized,[15] the view being founded on principles of equity, morality, and justice,[16] and in accord with good conscience, honesty, and reason;[17] and, as such, the doctrine subserves its true purpose as a plain, practical, fair, and necessary rule of law.[18]

II. ESTOPPEL BY RECORD

§ 4. Definition

Estoppel by record is the preclusion to deny the truth of matter set forth in a judicial or legislative record, and to deny the facts adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction.

An estoppel by matter of record is such as arises from, or is founded on, the adjudication of a competent court;[19] more broadly, estoppel by record is the preclusion to deny the truth of matter set forth in a record, whether judicial or legislative, and also to deny the facts adjudicated by a court of competent jurisdiction.[20]

No one may impeach the records of a court of justice in a collateral proceeding.

Technical estoppels
Estoppels forbid one to speak the truth, and hence technical estoppels are not favored.—Westinghouse Electric & Mfg. Co. v. Formica Insulation Co., C.C.A.Ohio, 288 F. 330, certiorari granted 44 S.Ct. 6, 263 U.S. 692, 68 L.Ed. 509, and affirmed 45 S.Ct. 117, 266 U.S. 342, 69 L.Ed. 316.

When interposed against statutory rights
Estoppels and nonstatutory bars, when interposed against statutory rights, are not favored, and should be applied only where facts are clear and definite.—In re Long, Cust. & Pat.App., 83 F.2d 458.

Parol or extrinsic evidence affecting public or official records see the C.J.S. title Evidence §§ 865–891, also 22 C.J. p 1077 note 63–p 1083 note 19.

It is a well established rule, as appears in the C.J.S. title Evidence § 765, also 22 C.J. p 968 note 89, that the records of a court of justice, including the record of a judgment, import absolute verity; and no one, whether or not a party to the proceeding in which they were made, may in a collateral proceeding impeach them by adducing evidence in denial of the facts of which they purport to be a memorial.[21] An estoppel will not be predicated on a portion of the record and of the facts, but on the whole thereof.[22]

§ 6. Judgments

The record of a judgment, considered as a judgment, precludes a reëxamination into the truth of the matters decided, the matters adjudicated being termed res judicata.

The estoppel arising from the record of a judgment considered as a memorial or entry thereof is considered in § 5 supra. As a judgment, the record has the further effect of precluding a reëxamination into the truth of the matters decided;[23] this further effect of the record considered as a judgment is otherwise known as estoppel by judgment, the matters adjudicated being termed res judicata.[24]

§ 7. Pleadings and Other Judicial Admissions

The general rule, which has not been followed in all cases, is that allegations or recitals made in a prior case or proceeding, in pleadings or otherwise, do not operate, in a subsequent case, proceeding, or transaction, as a technical estoppel by record against the party making them.

Although statements in pleadings constitute solemn judicial admissions of fact requiring evidence to contradict them,[25] independent of the estoppel raised by the judgment in the case,[26] allegations or recitals made in a prior case or proceeding, in pleadings or otherwise, do not, as a rule, operate, in a subsequent case, proceeding, or transaction, as a technical estoppel by record against the party making them.[27] This rule is especially applicable where the allegations or recitals are not inconsistent with the position subsequently assumed by the pleader,[28] or where the other party did not accept or rely on the statements or recitals.[29] Nevertheless, in some cases so-called estoppels by record have been invoked with respect to material allegations or recitals made in former proceedings;[30] but an examination of these authorities will usually disclose the presence of facts or circumstances under which the pleader might have been estopped or concluded other than by a technical estoppel by record.[31] In any case, there can be no estoppel by record where the allegations were immaterial,[32] or where they were made through inadvertence or by mistake.[33] Likewise, there cannot be such an estoppel where the allegations or recitals did not conclude the pleader in the prior proceeding,[34] as where the action was discontinued or dismissed without a decision on the merits.[35] In order to apply the doctrine of estoppel as to such matters, statements in favor of the pleader or declarant as well as those against his interest must be taken into consideration.[36]

§ 8. For or against Whom Estoppel Operates

Estoppels by record exist only as between the same parties or those in legal privity with them, and cannot be insisted on by one who is not himself bound thereby.

Estoppels by record, to the extent that they bind parties, will also bind their privies;[37] but they can exist only as between the same parties or those in legal privity with them,[38] and can be used neither by[39] nor against[40] strangers. Estoppels by record are mutual, and cannot be insisted on by one who is himself not bound thereby.[41]

The United States, when it once gets into court, may be estopped of record by its attorneys and officers, therein acting for it and representing it.[42]

§ 9. Matters Precluded

The rule of estoppel by record bars a second action between the same parties on an issue necessarily raised and decided in the first action.

The rule of estoppel by record bars a second action between the same parties on an issue necessarily raised and decided in the first action;[43] so, an issue of ownership of property and its incidents thus adjudicated cannot be relitigated in a second action between the same parties.[44] It has been held that the rule prevents a party not only from litigating again what was actually litigated in the former case, but also from litigating what might have been litigated therein.[45]

A party is not estopped from denying any fact which may be recited in a legislative act.[46]

III. ESTOPPEL BY DEED

A. IN GENERAL

§ 10. Definition, Nature, and Essentials

Estoppel by deed is a bar which precludes a party from denying the truth of his deed. It may be invoked only in a suit on the deed or concerning a right arising out of it.

Estoppel by deed is a bar which precludes a party to a deed and his privies from asserting as against the other and his privies any right or title in derogation of the deed, or from denying the truth of any material fact asserted in it.[47] In order that a deed may give rise to an estoppel, it must contain representations or covenants;[48] and an estoppel by deed may be invoked only in a suit on the deed or concerning a right arising out of the deed.[49] The doctrine of estoppel by deed is applied in order to avoid circuity of action,[50] and to compel the parties to fulfill their contracts.[51]

Change of position necessary. It has been held that an estoppel by deed is not created or enforceable unless there has been a change in the situation of one of the parties, in reliance on the deed.[52]

Estoppel in pais distinguished. Estoppel by deed is distinguishable from estoppel in pais,[53] in that it appears from the face of the deed,[54] and it does not require all of the elements of an estoppel in pais.[55]

Unlike estoppels in pais, a technical estoppel by deed may conclude a party without reference to the moral qualities of his conduct.[56]

"Estoppel by warranty" is an estoppel based on the principle of giving effect to the manifest intention of the grantor appearing on the deed, as to the lands or estate to be conveyed, and of preventing the grantor from derogating from or destroying his own grant by any subsequent act.[57]

§ 11. Mutuality

It is usually said that an estoppel by deed must be mutual, binding both parties.

It is usual to say that an estoppel by deed must be mutual, else it will not operate as a bar, and that unless both parties are bound neither will be concluded;[58] but exceptions and limitations to this statement will appear in succeeding sections.

§ 12. Estoppel against Estoppel

An estoppel against an estoppel sets the matter at large; so, the setting up of an estoppel by deed may be prevented or offset by another such estoppel, or a different form of estoppel, against the party seeking to set it up.

An estoppel against an estoppel sets the matter at large,[59] the two estoppels destroying or neutralizing each other.[60] Thus no one can set up an estoppel by deed against the estoppel arising from his own grant;[61] and if both parties claim under the same person and one is estopped by one deed and the other is estopped by another deed, both made by that person, one estoppel offsets the other, and the rights of the parties are to be adjusted without regard to any estoppel.[62] So the setting up of an estoppel by deed may be prevented by an estoppel in pais as against the grantee;[63] and an estoppel by the covenants of a deed is overcome by the estoppel created by the subsequent judgment of a competent tribunal.[64] A person who secures a patent from the commonwealth on an application which either mistakenly or falsely alleges that the land is vacant cannot claim that the commonwealth is estopped by reason of its patent from setting up a prior paramount title in itself, as there is an estoppel against an estoppel.[65]

Grantor as witness

(1) A grantor's estoppel by his deed does not render inadmissible testimony by him derogatory to his title in an action between his grantee and another.
Ky.—Spicer v. Terry, 291 S.W. 727, 218 Ky. 448.
Tex.—Simmons v. Brunson, Civ.App., 25 S.W.2d 685, error refused.

(2) Grantor who conveyed property by warranty deed could not impeach his own deed in proceedings involving validity of title of grantor's successors by testimony that deed to grantor was delivered to him more than ninety days before its recordation.—Wolford v. Rimbey, 178 A. 498, 318 Pa. 353.

(3) The testimony of grantor in mineral deed, that title had been conveyed to grantor's deceased husband by lost deed executed prior to deed secured by grantor after husband's death, was not competent to impeach mineral deed.—Henry v. Texas Co., Ark., 147 S.W.2d 742.

A grantor who holds a prior mortgage on the premises can assert no rights as mortgagee against his grantee.—Tripp v. Langston, 10 S.E.2d 916, 218 N.C. 295.

Absence of signature of one party

Participation in making and signing partition agreement estopped signer from asserting agreement was invalid because not signed by infant owners of some of land partitioned.—Van Hoose v. Fitzpatrick, 58 S.W.2d 587, 248 Ky. 335.

Deed to purchaser's assignee

Even if the vendor of land could assert against an assignee of a purchaser any equities which he could have urged against the original purchaser, notwithstanding the innocence of the assignee, he waived his right to rely on such equities by making the conveyance directly to the assignee, without informing him of the equities, by a deed containing full covenants of warranty, after which the assignee was an innocent purchaser under his deed, regardless of his standing under the assignment of the contract.—Bilbo v. Bell, 188 N.W. 753, 194 Iowa 875.

Partition deed

(1) One who joins in a deed of partition, and his privies, are estopped thereby to deny his ownership, interest, and title in the premises partitioned at the time of the execution of the deed, or to claim that he was holding possession of what he conveyed and released by a title paramount to that which he conveyed.—Tewksbury v. Provines, 12 Cal. 20—47 C.J. p 27 note 15.

(2) Partition deeds operate as an estoppel only so far as they establish the extent of the interest of each tenant in common as such.—Edwards v. Worthington, Tex.Civ.App., 118 S.W.2d 328—47 C.J. p 279 note 28.

(3) Where there is no conveying clause in a partition deed, a party is not estopped to assert that the other parties have no interest in the land.—Townsend v. Outten, 28 S.E. 958, 95 Va. 536.

(4) Since partition deeds do not confer title but simply segregate it among existing owners, where owner of land executed grazing lease to his son and died, and owner's children and devisees, before expiration of lease, executed partition deed in ordinary form, giving owner's daughters land leased, partition deed did not convey or extinguish son's leasehold interest under theory of warranty, theory of estoppel, or any other theory.—Edwards v. Worthington, supra.

(5) A donee, who formally accepted act of donation made to him, his brothers and niece, took part in partitioning of property, signed deed of partition which expressed mutual warranty of title to tracts set aside for each donee, and took an active part by representatives of his own choosing in appraising the different tracts as set out in partition deed, was estopped from questioning fact by his deed to question the capacity of his grantee to take the estate conveyed.[67] A warrantor of title may not question the validity of the title warranted, nor may he assert an outstanding hostile title.[68] One who creates estates by deed is estopped to utilize the doctrine of merger to destroy or alter rights so created.[69]

A lessor is estopped to deny that he had title.[70]

Conveyance by a third person as estoppel against owner. Where a person has, without authority, undertaken to sell and convey the land of another person, the real owner of the land should not be precluded by this wrongful act from asserting his title to the land.[71]

Personal property. The general rule that a grantor is estopped to assert anything in derogation of his deed has been said to apply to a conveyance of personal property.[72] So it has been held that, where a chattel or chose in action is assigned by deed, the grantor is estopped to deny that possession of the thing granted has not been transferred;[73] but the seller in a bill of sale has been held not estopped from testifying that he had no title.[74]

§ 14. Estoppel against Mortgagor

A mortgagor is estopped to assert anything in derogation of the rights which the mortgage purports to convey.

A mortgagor is estopped to assert anything in derogation of the rights which the mortgage purports to convey,[75] as that he had no title at the

that land had been partitioned amicably and legally.—Sandifer v. Sandifer's Heirs, La.App., 195 So. 118.

Grantee's knowledge of grantor's outstanding claim

Grantee having executed mortgage on property and thereafter conveyed to mortgagee in trust for himself subject to mortgage, a subsequent deed by the mortgagee as trustee to the grantee which did not mention the mortgage, did not preclude mortgagee from asserting rights under mortgage, in view of fact that grantee had himself executed the mortgage and that mortgage was already on the property when mortgagee acquired title as trustee.—Security Trust Co. of Pottstown v. Feist, 5 A.2d 119, 333 Pa. 536.

Nature of prior grant by grantor

Where a son, with other members of the family, took possession of lands and, before the expiration of the ten-year limitation period, moved away, giving whatever interest he had in the claim to his mother, who thereafter, without the son's participation, had a survey made of a specific one hundred sixty acres, including the improvements, and who subsequently matured title, the son was not estopped from testifying that his claim in entering on the lands was to an undesignated one hundred sixty acres, notwithstanding more than twenty years after moving away he executed a special warranty deed to a third person purporting to convey, not a limitation title, but a designated one hundred sixty acres.—W. T. Carter & Bro. v. Wells, 106 S.W.2d 1050, 130 Tex. 189, 115 A.L.R. 1293, affirming Wells v. W. T. Carter & Bro., Civ.App., 78 S.W.2d 678.

Admissions by adverse party

In an action to have declared simulated deeds to property standing in name of defendant, half brother of plaintiffs, and to have it decreed to belong to succession of their deceased mother, one of plaintiffs as record vendor of such defendant was not estopped to attack or deny the import of the conveyance where defendant, required by statute to confess, deny, or state other facts tending to his defense, or closely linked to the fact on which he was questioned by interrogatories, admitted that the deed from their mother to such plaintiff vendor was simulated.—Phelps v. Mulhaupt, 84 So. 362, 146 La. 1078.

Estoppel to effectuate merger

Conveyance of life estate with statutory warranties to one person, with contingent remainders in fee to others, by grantor retaining reversion, was held to estop grantor and those claiming under him from destroying contingent remaindermen's interests by a conveyance uniting the present interest and the reversion.—Marvin v. time of executing it,[76] that there is an outstanding title in a third person,[77] that the estate mortgaged was other or less than an estate in fee simple,[78] that the instrument was not executed as appears on its face,[79] or that the instrument, although running to the mortgagee, was in fact the property of a firm to which the mortgagee belonged.[80]

A limitation of the general rule has been recognized to the effect that, where a mortgage is given solely to secure a debt that has long existed, the mortgagor is not the recipient of such benefits under the mortgage that he will be estopped to deny its validity.[81] Further, the covenants in a mortgage given to secure purchase money will not estop the mortgagor, where the deed and mortgage are one and the same transaction, from suing on the covenants of the deed.[82]

A mortgagor of chattels is estopped to deny his ownership thereof, or the title of the mortgagee.[83]

§ 15. Estoppel against Grantee

Generally, a grantee, by accepting a deed, is not estopped to deny his grantor's title, except where he relies on such grantor's conveyance to establish his own claim.

While no one can impugn the title under which he holds,[84] it is generally held that, by accepting a deed, a grantee is not estopped to deny the grantor's title or seizin, except where the grantee relies on the grantor's conveyance to establish his own

Defective description

As between mortgagor and mortgagee, former cannot take advantage of defective description of property contained in trust deed.—Battle v. Wolfe, Tex.Civ.App., 283 S.W. 1073, error refused.

Mortgagee's knowledge of limitation

Mortgagor taking premises under will limiting power to encumber and convey was held not estopped in mortgage foreclosure from setting up such limitations as grounds for rendering mortgage unenforceable as to her where mortgagee took with knowledge of limitation.—Minter v. People's Nat. Bank & Trust Co. of Sullivan, 182 N.E. 87, 95 Ind.App. 204.

Estoppel to claim merger

The owner of lands who treats a mortgage on the lands which has been assigned to him as a valid instrument, and transfers it as such, is estopped from insisting as against the assignee or anyone claiming under him that in his hands it had merged and disappeared in the fee, and the same estoppel controls his grantee who accepts a conveyance of the premises with actual constructive notice of the existence of the mortgage.

claim.[85] One having or claiming title to land may for greater security or to buy his peace purchase or procure an outstanding or adverse claim or title without estopping himself to deny its validity,[86] unless he abandons his claim under the title by virtue of which he entered into possession.[87] So a grantee may buy up a title antagonistic to that of his grantor, and set up the title so bought to defeat that of his grantor or of his grantor's representatives,[88] except, according to some authorities, where the grantee obtained possession of the land by the grantor's deed.[89] It has also been held that one of two grantees of the same grantor may connect himself with, and assert against the other, a title paramount to that of the common grantor.[90]

If the grantee, or one claiming under him, asserts no other right or title than that conveyed by the grantor's deed, he is estopped to deny that the grantor had title when he conveyed.[91] So, where

Reason for rule; no privity

"As a general proposition of law, the grantee named in a deed of conveyance does not hold in privity with his grantor, but rather holds adversely to the grantor, and is not estopped to deny the title of his grantor."—Oregon Short Line R. Co. v. Quigley, 80 P. 401, 10 Idaho 770, 784.

Second deed from same grantor

(1) Acceptance of new grant is admission that title to property granted is in grantor.—People v. Tompkins-Kiel Marble Co., 199 N.E. 10, 269 N.Y. 77, reversing 270 N.Y.S. 940, 241 App.Div. 695, affirming 265 N.Y.S. 243, 148 Misc. 559.

(2) A grantee who accepts from his grantor a new deed as a substitute for the original is estopped to claim title to land described in the original deed which is not included in the substitute.—People v. Tompkins-Kiel Marble Co., supra—21 C.J. p. 1072 note 25.

(3) Grantees under joint deed, who treated deed as mere bond for title, and who thereafter procured separate deeds for separate tracts to themselves or assignee, were held estopped to set up any claim under original joint deed.—Vanover v Meadors, 280 S.W. 1095, 213 Ky. 363.

(4) Railroad's acceptance of second deed of certain lands was held not to estop railroad from asserting greater estate in lands than was created by second deed, where first deed of lands was complete in its terms and effectually passed to railroad all the title which grantor had in lands, which, presumptively, was the whole title.—Nesral Production Co. v. St. Louis, B. & M. Ry. Co., Tex. Civ.App., 84 S.W.2d 805, error dismissed.

(5) Where a grantee surrenders the deed to the grantor and takes a new deed conveying the same and additional property, with no intention of revesting title in the grantor, he is not estopped to assert that he had title under the original deed.—St. Joseph v. Baker, 86 Mo.App. 310.

Conveyances from mortgagor and mortgagee

"When a man receives from both mortgagor and mortgagee unqualified conveyances with no covenant, conditions, or duties on his part, he is, of course, in the same situation as if he had received a similar conveyance of unmortgaged land from one grantor. A grantee so circumstanced is not estopped to dispute his grantor's title."—Webber v. Austin, 121 A. 673, 676, 123 Me. 95.

Where a deed was not accepted by the grantee, and, although filed in the county clerk's office, was not filed by him, and he did not authorize anyone to file it, he was not estopped, as against persons who saw such deed on file, to deny that he was holding under such deed; he is not charged with constructive knowledge of the unauthorized filing of the deed by some one else.—Fidelity Lumber Co. v. adverse claimants to land trace their chain of title through a common source, each is estopped, as against the other, to deny that such grantor had title.[92]

One who has accepted a deed with covenants of seizin is estopped to allege that the covenants were broken because he was himself seized of the premises at the time the deed was executed.[93]

One who dismisses an action to cancel a deed he has given and in return receives a deed from his grantee is estopped to deny that the deed he gave was valid or that his grantee had title.[94]

§ 16. Estoppel against Mortgagee

One who accepts a mortgage is generally estopped to deny the mortgagor's title.

A party who accepts a mortgage is generally estopped to deny the mortgagor's title,[95] as are his successors;[96] however, if the mortgagor executes a second mortgage of the premises, the first mortgage is not estopped to deny that at the time of executing the second mortgage the mortgagor did not own the legal title.[97] Where the mortgagee assigns the mortgage, he is estopped to assert that his mortgagor had no existence,[98] or to deny his assignee's title,[99] as by setting up as against his assignee a prior conflicting title in himself.[1] Where a mortgagee records his instrument as a real estate mortgage on a house and lot, and files a bill to foreclose it as such, he is estopped to treat his mortgage at and after foreclosure as a chattel mortgage on the house which was not attached to the lot.[2]

§ 17. Instruments Founding Estoppel

Any invalid instrument affirming that the grantor has a particular estate and purporting to convey it will found an estoppel against him.

Whatever the form or nature of the instrument, if it affirms, either by implication or express terms, that the grantor is seized or possessed of a particular estate which the instrument purports to convey, it will found an estoppel against the grantor.[3] The instrument need contain no technical covenants for title; if it bears on its face evidence that the grantor intended to convey and the grantee expected to become invested with an estate of a particular description or quality, and that the bargain had proceeded on that footing, it creates an estoppel against the grantor in respect of the estate thus described, although no technical covenants are inserted.[4] However, as appears infra § 43, an invalid instrument will not serve as the basis for an estoppel by deed.

§ 18. Deeds

It is generally held that a quitclaim deed will not support an estoppel and that the estoppel arising from a deed poll binds only the grantor and not the grantee; but there are exceptions to both of these rules.

Quitclaim deed. It is broadly stated that no estoppel arises from making or accepting a quitclaim deed.[5] A deed of this character does not estop the grantee to dispute the grantor's title or seizin,[6] or the quality of the title,[7] or to deny that anything passed by the instrument.[8] However, the grantor is estopped by a quitclaim deed from asserting any previously acquired interest in the property;[9] and a distinct recital in a quitclaim deed showing that the parties proceeded on the theory that a particular interest was thereby conveyed may be as effectual to create an estoppel as a warranty.[10]

Deed poll. According to the weight of authority, the estoppel arising from a deed poll ordinarily applies only to the grantor and does not operate against the grantee, who may accordingly deny that his grantor had such an estate as he undertook to convey;[11] the acceptance of a deed poll will not estop the grantee to deny the grantor's title or to acquire a superior title.[12] However, there are a number of decisions in which this rule is repudiated in toto[13] or materially limited.[14] In any event, it is generally held that, where the deed contains agreements or covenants to be performed by the grantee, his acceptance of the deed estops him to deny them.[15] It has been said that a grantee who has accepted a deed with seizin cannot allege that the grantor's covenants are broken by reason of the fact that the grantee himself, at the time he accepted the deed, was seized of the premises.[16]

§ 19. Mortgages

A chattel mortgage may found an estoppel by deed.

A deed in the form of a chattel mortgage may ordinarily found an estoppel the same as any other.[17]

§ 20. Other Instruments

The doctrine of estoppel by deed has been held to apply to a legislative grant of land, an antenuptial agreement, and a mechanic's lien, but not to an assignment of invention.

C. ESTOPPEL TO ASSERT AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE

§ 21. To Real Estate

With some qualifications, the general rule is that a grantor who acquires a title or estate which he has previously purported to convey is estopped to deny that such after-acquired title passed by the conveyance.

With qualifications which will appear, the general rule is that, if a grantor of real estate having no title, a defective title, or an estate less than that which he assumed to grant, subsequently acquires the title or estate which he purported to convey, or perfects his title, such after-acquired or perfected title will inure to the grantee or to his benefit, or to his successors, by way of estoppel of the grantor or those claiming under him, particularly where the conveyance was with covenants of warranty.[24]

However, one who relies on estoppel for an after-acquired title can have no greater right than has the grantor against whom the estoppel is claimed.[25]

Reason for rule. It has been held that the rule rests on the ground that it would be iniquitous to permit one, after he has asserted ownership of land and made a deed conveying it to another, on a valuable consideration, to obtain by deed an outstanding title and hold it against his purchaser in spite of the deed he has made to him.[26] However, the reason usually assigned is that the rule was adopted to avoid circuity of action.[27]

Rule limited

Rule that covenant of warranty passes subsequently acquired title is limited by rule that searcher of records need not go beyond origin of title claimed in record—Williams v. Cook, Tex.Com.App., 282 S.W. 574, affirming, Civ.App., 272 S.W. 809.

Conveyance without grantor's authority is not within text rule.—War Fork Land Co. v. Carr, 33 S.W.2d 308, 236 Ky. 453.

Relation back

When necessary in furtherance of justice transfer of title resulting from several transactions takes effect by relation from first substantive act.—Tendolle v. Eureka Oil Syndicate, 268 P. 185, 38 Wyo. 442, rehearing denied 270 P. 542, 38 Wyo. 442.

Partition deed

(1) Warranty in partition deed cannot be made to operate as conveyance by estoppel of after-acquired title.—Walling v. Harendt, Tex.Civ.App., 37 S.W.2d 280, error dismissed.

(2) A partition deed has, however, been held to bind an after-acquired title as between parties and privies. Neb.—Hagensick v. Castor, 73 N.W. 932, 53 Neb. 495.

(3) Where intestate's son and daughter inherited realty, subject to dower, intestate's son and widow mortgaged realty, and son, daughter, and widow executed partition deed to allocate one half of realty to each of son and daughter, subject to dower, daughter's purchase on foreclosure of mortgage was not an after-acquired title which redounded to son's benefit because of partition deed.—Wofford v. Jackson, 111 S.W. 2d 542, 194 Ark. 1049.

(4) Where one of two tenants in common, with knowledge of outstanding mortgage debt for which both cotenants were liable, conveyed to other cotenant under warranty to defend title against all lawful claims, trust relationship arose which estopped grantor's executor from claiming title through purchase at foreclosure sale, and purchase would be held to have been made for benefit of grantee's heirs; rule that actual partition merely designates share of cotenant and allots land to him in severalty and does not create title was held inapplicable.—Kelly v. Davis, 188 S.E. 853, 211 N.C. 1.

Reducing an existing claim to judgment does not make it an after-acquired claim.—Phipps v. Sappenfield, 102 N.E. 841, 54 Ind.App. 139.

When a sale, lease, mortgage or lien is granted at a time when the vendor is not the owner of property, after-acquired ownership inures to the benefit of such vendee, lessee, mortgagee or lienee.—Angichiodo v. Cerami, D.C.La., 35 F.Supp. 359.

Consideration. In order that an after-acquired title shall pass to a grantee under a warranty of title, it is not necessary that the conveyance should have been on a valuable consideration.[28]

Fraud or mistake. The rule applies equally whether the party assuming to convey title acted under an honest mistake[29] or committed a fraud.[30] According to several authorities, the fact that the conveyance was made to defraud creditors does not affect the operation of the rule, since it is good as between the parties;[31] but there is authority to the contrary.[32]

Champertous conveyances have been held to pass after-acquired title,[33] but other authorities hold that such conveyances are void and do not estop the grantor to assert a subsequently acquired title.[34]

Grantee's knowledge. It has been held that a subsequently acquired title will not pass where the grantee knew of the deficiencies in the grantor's title,[35] as where the deficiencies appeared in the deed.[36] On the other hand, it has been held that, where the grantor's knowledge was as great as, or greater than, the grantee's, he cannot rely on the grantee's knowledge to avoid being estopped by his deed.[37]

Enlarging estate granted. The warranty contained in the deed cannot operate to enlarge the estate granted.[38]

Mechanic's lien. The rule that the grantor is estopped to assert an after-acquired title applies to the grant of a mechanic's lien.[39]

Lease. A lessor is estopped to set up an after-acquired title as against his lessee.[40] Similarly, the after-acquired title of a lessee inures to the benefit of his assignee.[41]

§ 22. Deeds

A conveyance which purports to convey only the grantor's present interest will not estop him to assert an after-acquired title; and this is the general rule as to quitclaim deeds.

A conveyance which does not purport to convey any estate or which conveys only a present estate, or the right, title, and interest of the grantor passes only such a title as the grantor has at the time of its execution and delivery, and will not operate to confer on the grantee a new and independent title subsequently acquired by the grantor, estoppel being coextensive with the estate, right, or interest which the conveyance purports to pass.[42] A fortiori, an instrument which expressly excludes after-acquired property from its operation will not estop the grantor from asserting a subsequently acquired title.[43]

Quitclaim deeds. Since, as stated in the title Deeds, § 8, a quitclaim deed is one which purports to convey only the grantor's present interest or estate, if any, the general rule is that a quitclaim deed will not estop the grantor from setting up a title subsequently acquired by him.[44] However, it has been held that this rule applies only to a quitclaim deed in the strict and proper sense of that species of conveyance, and that, if the deed bears on its face evidence that the grantor intended to convey, and the grantee expected to become invested with, an estate of a particular description of quality, and that the bargain had proceeded on such footing between the parties, it will estop the grantor to assert an after-acquired title which is within the estate purported to be conveyed;[45] and, under a statute so providing, a quitclaim deed will pass an after-acquired title.[46]

§ 23. Mortgage

The estoppel of a mortgagor to assert as against his mortgagee a title or interest acquired subsequent to the execution of the mortgage is treated in the C.J.S. title Mortgages § 185, also 21 C.J. p 1078 note 98–p 1079 note 9 and 41 C.J. p 478 note 77–p 481 note 3.

§ 24. Personal Property

After-acquired title of a seller of personalty inures to the benefit of the buyer, at least where there is a warranty of title.

Where personal property is sold with an express warranty of title by the seller, who at the time has no title, his subsequent acquisition of title inures to the benefit of the buyer by estoppel.[47] Moreover, there is authority for the view that, in sales of personalty, even without any express covenant of warranty, the title afterward acquired by a vendor in property which he has sold passes to the grantee;[48]

No buyer-seller relationship

Where holder of part of series of notes secured by same mortgage instituted foreclosure proceeding and purchased property at public sale as representative of another, the "equitable estoppel" doctrine could not be invoked by another holder of some of the notes who was not a party to the foreclosure proceeding, for purpose of contending that mortgage creditor who foreclosed purchased property for benefit of all the mortgage noteholders, where there was neither express nor implied warranty by the mortgage creditor who foreclosed in favor of the other noteholder because the other noteholder acquired the note from someone else.—Stahl v. but it has been held that a sale estops the seller as to an after-acquired title only when it is with express or implied warranty of title.[49]

§ 25. Instruments Founding Estoppel

To give rise to an estoppel to assert an after-acquired title, there must be an instrument purporting to convey an estate.

To give rise to an estoppel to assert an after-acquired title, there must be an instrument purporting to convey an estate.[50] According to the weight of authority, an execution sale of property not belonging to the debtor does not estop him from asserting against the purchaser title subsequently acquired,[51] although there is some authority apparently to the contrary.[52]

§ 26. Necessity for Covenants

The authorities disagree as to whether an instrument not containing covenants can found an estoppel to assert an after-acquired title.

According to some authorities, a deed must contain a covenant of warranty in order to preclude the grantor from asserting an after-acquired title and cause such title to inure to the grantee.[53] However, it is frequently held that other covenants may give rise to the estoppel, as appears infra § 27, and that, if a deed either expressly or by necessary implication shows that the grantor intended to convey, and that the grantee expected to become vested with, an estate of a particular kind, the deed may found an estoppel, although it contains no technical covenants.[54] Moreover, statutes in a number of juris-

Rule as equitable doctrine
While the doctrine of estoppel has been enlarged to include deeds without covenant or warranties to the extent of protecting bona fide purchasers, it is still an equitable doctrine, and not an inflexible rule, a shield of the innocent, and not a sword for destruction.—Jackson v. Mills, 115 S.E. 881, 185 N.C. 53.

Implied covenants
The doctrine of after-acquired title, whether by statutory provision or by contract lien, may be invoked in the absence of express warranty, based on implied covenants in the grant or by express covenants by contract to the effect that previous to the execution of the conveyance the grantor had not conveyed the same estate nor any right, title or interest therein to any person other than the grantee.—Person v. Levenson, Tex.Civ.App., 143 S.W.2d 419.

In Pennsylvania the rule is laid down, without regard to whether the instrument contains covenants, that, when a vendor or mortgagor sells or mortgages land which he does not own, and afterward obtains title thereto, he will not be permitted to set up this after-acquired title to defeat his previous grant or mortgage, for this would be to permit him to perpetrate fraud on his grantee or creditor.—Rushton v. Lippincott, 12 A. 761, 119 Pa. 12—21 C.J. p 1081 note 25.

dictions have been construed as providing that conveyances purporting to convey the fee, or to convey a greater interest than the grantee has, or containing prescribed words of grant, are deemed to have the same legal effect as deeds which by the terms of the grant or covenants therein would estop the grantor to claim an after-acquired title or estate.[55]

§ 27. Nature of Covenant

Various covenants other than a covenant of warranty have been held, or held not, to estop a grantor from asserting an after-acquired title.

The requirement of a covenant of warranty to bring about an estoppel to assert after-acquired title is considered supra §§ 21 and 26.

Covenant for quiet enjoyment or possession. An ordinary deed of bargain and sale with covenant for quiet enjoyment gives the grantee the benefit of a title subsequently acquired by the grantor.[56] Such also is the effect of a conveyance with covenants of special warranty and quiet possession.[57]

Covenant of seizin and right to convey. In some jurisdictions title by estoppel may be founded on a covenant of seizin and right to convey;[58] in others the contrary rule has been maintained.[59]

A covenant against encumbrances will estop the grantor to assert a subsequent title acquired through the enforcement of a lien existing at the time of the conveyance,[60] but not a title otherwise acquired.[61]

Covenant of nonclaim. According to some decisions, a covenant of nonclaim in a deed amounts to the ordinary covenant of warranty and operates as an estoppel on an after-acquired title,[62] being confined, however, to the estate granted by the deed.[63] However, other decisions hold that a covenant of nonclaim will not operate as an estoppel against the grantor as to an after-acquired title,[64] even where it is joined with a covenant against encumbrances.[65]

Covenant for further assurance. A subsequent title inures under a covenant for further assurance as well as under a covenant of warranty;[66] and under at least one statute, if a quitclaim deed contains a covenant for further assurance, a title subsequently acquired by the grantor will inure to the benefit of his grantee, the same as if the deed had contained a covenant of warranty.[67]

Special covenants. A conveyance with special covenants as to acts of the grantor or those in privity with him, or against a particular title, will not preclude the grantor to acquire or assert an after-acquired title,[68] unless such acquisition is against the terms of the covenants therein.[69]

§ 28. Inoperative Covenants

By the weight of authority, a grantor is not estopped to assert an after-acquired estate if there is no liability on his covenants.

Although it has been held that the general rule as to title by estoppel is not changed by the fact that a right of action on the covenant on which the estoppel is based is barred by limitation,[70] the weight of authority is to the effect that a grantor is not estopped to assert an after-acquired estate, if there is no liability on his covenants because of their being inoperative or having been extinguished.[71]

§ 29. Instruments Giving Momentary Seizin Only

An estate of which a grantor is given only momentary seizin will not inure to his grantee.

Where a grantor conveys without consideration, and the grantee without consideration and as a part of the same transaction reconveys to the grantor, a momentary seizin only, not beneficial even for a moment, vests in the first grantee, and he is not invested with any title inuring to the benefit of one to whom he has previously conveyed the same land by mortgage deed of warranty.[72]

§ 30. Estates or Rights Affected

The doctrine of estoppel to assert an after-acquired title applies to any estate or interest that the deed purports to convey, provided the conveyance of such interest is not void or against public policy; and the doctrine has been applied to the conveyance of various types of estates or interests.

The estoppel to assert an after-acquired title will not operate as to land or an interest therein other than that which is specifically conveyed or called for by the plain import of the conveyance, and to which the covenants for title are confined.[73] A fortiori is this so in respect of land which is expressly reserved or excepted from the operation of the conveyance.[74] The doctrine of estoppel of a grantor to assert a title acquired after conveyance has been said to apply without regard to the method whereby such title is acquired,[75] or to whether the title subsequently acquired is legal or equitable.[76] The doctrine has been applied to conveyances by parties having merely an equitable title or interest therein who subsequently acquired the legal title;[77] to a conveyance by an heir of a particular tract of land, part of his ancestor's estate, which he expects will be allotted to him on partition;[78] to an attempted conveyance by an heir before the death of the ancestor, where the heir survived the ancestor,[79] unless the conveyance of such an interest is held to be invalid, void, or against public policy;[80] to a conveyance by one having only a limited estate, on his subsequently acquiring a greater estate by inheritance;[81] to a conveyance of an entire tract where the grantor subsequently acquires by descent or otherwise a title to a further undivided part of the tract;[82] to a conveyance of an estate which by reason of a contingency was not transmissible at the time the conveyance was executed, where the estate subsequently passed to the grantor on the happening of the contingency;[83] to a conveyance by a child of one who holds a life estate in land,

Covenant of warranty; restriction on exemption

(1) A conveyance by a city, without covenants of seizin or warranty, of all the right, title and interest of the city in tidelands, to which it then had no title and never acquired title, was not sufficient to support a suit to quiet title against the city on account of its subsequent occupation and improvement of the land in aid of navigation under authority of a state statute, which forbade alienation by the city.—Dean v. with remainder to his heirs, where the grantor survives the life tenant;[84] to a conveyance by one who subsequently acquires a tax title to the land which he attempted to convey;[85] to a conveyance by a wife of land in which she had only an estate by the entirety, where her husband afterward devised her all of his rights;[86] to a conveyance of land by a coal land entryman who conveyed it after filing his declaratory statement but before completing his entry, where he subsequently obtains a patent for the land;[87] and to a conveyance by one in whom title is to vest by conveyance and devise on the death of the father, where he survives the father.[88] So, also, a purchaser from a member of a class, in which a remainder expectant on the death of the life tenant is vested, takes title against his vendor by estoppel on the death of the life tenant.[89]

A conveyance of all property that the grantor may thereafter in any manner acquire has been held void and not to estop the grantor from asserting an after-acquired title.[90]

Although a possibility of reverter or a right of reëntry for breach of condition subsequent is not regarded as an alienable interest, a conveyance of such right will operate by way of estoppel against the grantor when the property is acquired by him by reason of such right.[91]

Easements are property within the rule of estoppel as to after-acquired property.[92]

§ 31. Title Acquired by Patent from Sovereignty

A title acquired through a patent of land after a purported conveyance of the land will inure to the grantee, unless the grantor's want of a present vested estate appeared on the deed.

When one entitled to a grant or patent of land from the state or general government purports to convey the land, the legal title when acquired by him through the issuance of the patent will vest in his grantee or inure to the latter's benefit.[93] So, where the patent was issued to others under an assignment of the land warrant to them by the grantor to perfect title to other land given them, the assignees took title under the land warrant, subject to such grantee's prior title;[94] and it has been held that, although a quitclaim deed does not operate to convey a subsequently acquired patent title not actually owned in equity when the deed was given,[95] it will nevertheless convey land thereafter patented if the grantor at the time of the conveyance is entitled to a patent by reason of performance of conditions prerequisite to its issuance,[96] or if the quitclaim expressly includes after-acquired title.[97]

However, it is essential to the success of such an estoppel that the grantor's want of a present vested estate should not appear on the deed itself, which would otherwise contain internal evidence of its invalidity.[98] The fact that the vendor after acquiring title from the government conveys his land with full covenants of warranty to a third person does not affect the operation of the rule where the latter recognizes the title of the first purchaser by accepting and acting under a power of attorney from him, and does not occupy the land.[99]

§ 32. Title Acquired in Name of Third Person

A grantor, by taking title to after-acquired property in a third person's name, will not defeat the estoppel to assert such title.

A grantor cannot defeat the estoppel to assert title to after-acquired property by procuring title to such property to be taken in the name of a third person.[1] However, the acquisition of an adverse title by a wife will not inure to the benefit of a grantee to whom the husband has conveyed with warranty.[2]

§ 33. Title Acquired for Third Person

Title acquired by a grantor for a third party will not inure to the grantee.

The doctrine of estoppel to assert an after-acquired title does not apply where such a title passes to the grantor subject to a resulting trust in favor of a third party who is the actual purchaser, or the conveyance is made to him as a conduit and for the purpose of vesting the title in a third person.[3] It has been held, however, that where a person holding a bond for title conveyed the property, and afterward the vendor conveyed to him, and at the same time a third person advanced the money to pay the vendor, and thereupon took a mortgage on the land from the purchaser, the purchaser was not a mere instrument of conveyance or a trustee of the mortgagee so as to vest title in the mortgagee to the exclusion of the first grantee.[4]

§ 34. Title Acquired from or Adversely to Grantee

Where a title defeating the grantee's title is acquired by the grantor from the grantee or through the latter's act or failure to act, such title will not inure to the grantee's benefit.

A title subsequently acquired by a grantor by purchase from the grantee or those claiming under him will not inure to the benefit of him or them.[5]

Judicial sale. If the property is sold as the grantee's at an execution or judicial sale, the grantor is not estopped by his covenant from purchasing at the sale and asserting the title thus acquired against the grantee;[6] a grantor is not estopped to acquire a title based on the enforcement of an obligation against the property created by the grantee.[7] However, where a grantee is divested of title by the foreclosure of a mortgage which existed at the time of the grant, a title acquired by the grantor at the sale,[8] or from the purchaser at the sale,[9] has been held to inure to the grantee's benefit, although under other authority a title acquired through the purchaser at the foreclosure sale is an independent title which will not inure to the grantee's benefit.[10] Where the conveyance was subject to the mortgage, a title acquired by the grantor through the foreclosure of such mortgage will not pass to the grantee.[11]

The grantor may acquire title through a sale for taxes which have accrued since the conveyance,[12] but not where the taxes were a lien at the time of the conveyance, or the sale was the result of the grantor's delinquency.[13]

An after-acquired title based on the vendor's lien of the true owner may be enforced by the grantor.[14]

Adverse possession. A subsequent possession by the grantor of the premises conveyed for the period prescribed by the statute of limitations will inure to his benefit and not to the benefit of the grantee;[15] and, similarly, the grantor may by prescription obtain an easement over the land granted.[16] However, if such possession is held in subserviency to the title of the grantee, the possession thereof will inure to the grantee's benefit.[17]

Deed rendered nugatory. After the deed on which the estoppel is based is rendered nugatory by judicial decree or the operation of law, the grantor is not estopped to set up a title subsequently acquired by him.[18]

§ 35. Operation of Law in Vesting Title in Grantee

The estoppel against a grantor to assert an after-acquired title is generally held to vest such title in the grantee by operation of law and to be effective against a bona fide purchaser of such title.

18. Kan.—Schultz v. Cities Service Oil Co., 86 P.2d 533, 149 Kan. 148.

By the common law only two classes of conveyances were held to operate an actual transfer of an after-acquired estate; such an operation was given to conveyances by feoffment, fine, or common recovery on account of their solemnity and publicity, and to those by indenture of lease from the implied covenants arising from such indenture.[19] According to some authorities, if a person conveys land with general warranty and does not own it at the time, the grantee has the right to have a subsequently acquired title transferred to him, but such acquisition does not operate actually to transfer the estate subsequently acquired;[20] but the generally prevailing rule is that the estoppel has the effect of vesting the after-acquired title in the grantee by operation of law,[21] without the intervention of any court.[22] The latter rule will not be applied so as to defeat the grantee's cause of action against the grantor where he was wholly evicted from the premises by a title paramount,[23] or instituted an action for rescission,[24] before the grantor acquired title.

Right as against subsequent grantee. The weight of authority is that the grantee may urge the estoppel against a bona fide purchaser of the grantor's after-acquired title, even under the recording acts;[25] it has been said that however much this doctrine may be at variance with the spirit of the recording acts it does not violate the letter thereof.[26] Some authorities limit this rule to such after-acquired title as had its origin prior to the instrument creating the estoppel.[27]

On the other hand, there is a view that the grantee cannot urge the estoppel against a bona fide purchaser of the after-acquired title where the deed to the grantee was made at a time when the grantor had no estate in the land.[28]

Subsequent judgment creditors. If between the date of the conveyance and the acquisition of the perfect title a judgment is rendered against the grantor, the title of the grantee is prior to the lien of the judgment.[29]

D. ESTOPPEL TO DENY TRUTH OF RECITALS

§ 36. In General

Ordinarily the parties to an instrument are estopped to deny recitals therein intended as admissions of fact.

As a general rule the parties to an instrument are estopped to deny recitals therein intended by them as admissions of fact.[30]

§ 37. In Deeds

a. In general
b. General and particular recitals
c. Materiality
d. Extent of estoppel

a. In General

As a general rule all parties to a deed, and those claiming through them, are bound by the recitals in it legitimately appertaining to its subject matter.

As a general rule, all parties to a deed, and those claiming through them, are bound by the recitals in it legitimately appertaining to the subject matter of it.[31]

Recitals of matter of fact in a deed are ordinarily binding on the grantor;[32] and, in addition, they are binding on the grantee and his successors in estate

Estoppel against school district by recitals in bonds see the C.J.S. title Schools and School Districts § 372, also 56 C.J. p 629 note 24-p 630 note 27.

Estoppel by recitals in simple contracts see infra § 58.

Reason for rule

The legal rule which makes the statements of a sealed instrument incontestible by the party to it grows out of the circumstance that such statements are the deliberate utterances of such party.—Singer Mfg. Co. v. Elizabeth, 42 N.J.Law 249.

Recitals in lease

Where lessee of fleet of towboats, barges, and other appliances by terms of lease acknowledged title to be in the government, he was estopped from contending to the contrary.—Weeks v. Goltra, C.C.A.Mo., 7 F.2d 838, certiorari granted Goltra v. Weeks, 46 S.Ct. 102, 269 U.S. 545, 70 L.Ed. 404, affirmed 46 S.Ct. 613, 271 U.S. 536, 70 L.Ed. 1074.

Recitals held not to create estoppel:

(1) In favor of a party who had totally ignored the instrument containing the recitals.—Clark v. Reynolds, 100 S.E. 468, 125 Va. 626.

(2) To show true nature of instrument.—McLeod Nash Motors v. Commercial Credit Trust, 246 N.W. 17, 187 Minn. 452, 87 A.L.R. 296.

21 C.J. p 1088 note 91—47 C.J. p 278 note 21, p 279 note 22.

Fixation of facts

When the recital shows that the object of the parties to the deed was to make the matter recited a fixed fact, such recital binds all the parties, and as to them and their privies the matter recited becomes a fixed fact.—Williams v. Johns-Carroll Lumber Co., 192 So. 278, 238 Ala. 536—Youngerman-Reynolds Hardwood Co. v. Hicks, 181 So. 111, 236 Ala. 138—Pendrey v. Godwin, 66 So. 43, 188 Ala. 565.

Reliance on representations

(1) In order to invoke the estoppel, it has been held that one claiming the benefit thereof must show that he was misled to his injury by reason of his reliance on the recitals in the deed and that he had no notice of facts contrary to those recited.—Kuykendall v. Spiller, Tex.Civ.App., 299 S.W. 522.

(2) A recital in a deed is not necessarily binding on the grantor where it is inserted without his knowledge and no one is misled thereby.—Cartwright v. Jones, 1 S.E.2d 559, 215 N.C. 108.

Recital as to payment of purchase money

Under a statute defining estoppels, recitals in deeds, except payment of purchase money, generally work an estoppel as against the grantor and his privies.—Sikes v. Sikes, 133 S.E. 239, 162 Ga. 302—Gammage v. Perry, 116 S.E. 126, 29 Ga.App. 427.

Recital as to obligation of grantees

Where deed to two life tenants recited that both grantees were to keep buildings insured and in repair, and one of grantees reconveyed interest to grantors, grantors were estopped from denying, as against remaining grantee, that both grantees were to carry out obligations assumed in deed.—Sanderson v. Sanderson, 171 S.E. 60, 205 N.C. 260.

if they claim under the deed,[33] but not otherwise.[34] Such recitals do not bind mere strangers or those who claim by title paramount to the reciting deed.[35]

Intent of parties. The estoppel is limited by the intention of the parties and whether one party or the other or both are estopped by a recital depends on their intent as manifested by the deed.[36]

Consideration of entire instrument. In determining the effect of recitals, the entire instrument must be considered, and a recital will not work an estoppel if it is shown to be untrue by taking into consideration other parts of the instrument.[37]

b. General and Particular Recitals

To found an estoppel the recital must be certain, and accordingly only particular recitals will work an estoppel.

To found an estoppel the recital must be certain.[38] With this idea in mind, recitals have been classified as being either general or particular; general recitals are such as do not definitely affirm or deny the existence of some fact, or either expressly or impliedly show a clear intention of the parties that either one or the other or both of them shall be concluded from disputing the fact recited, and such recitals do not work an estoppel as to the fact in question.[39]

Particular recitals, on the other hand, are such as definitely affirm or deny the existence of some fact and either expressly or impliedly show a clear intention of the parties that either one or the other or both shall be precluded from asserting anything to the contrary; these recitals are binding.[40]

c. Materiality

Recitals in a deed are estoppels only when they are of the essence of the contract.

Recitals in a deed are estoppels when they are the Reason for rule

The doctrine that one asserting title under a conveyance is estopped to deny the truth of its recitals is based on the common-sense rule that he is not at liberty to claim under it and deny it at the same time.—Ramsey v. Kitchen, Ga., 15 S.E.2d 877.

Matters appearing in chain of title
Grantee by accepting deed is bound by provisions thereof and of all matters appearing in his chain of title.—Dodge & Bliss Co. v. Jersey City, 144 A. 14, 103 N.J.Eq. 552, reversed on other grounds 148 A. 783, 105 N.J. Eq. 545.

Deed from life tenant to remainderman
Acceptance by remainderman of fee-simple deed from life tenant conveying property in trust with provision that remainderman might acquire ownership, constitutes an element of estoppel against subsequent claim as remainderman.—Boyle v. Maryland State Fair, 134 A. 124, 150 Md. 333.

Recitals as evidence
Where a stranger to a deed relies on admissions of the grantor recited therein, such recitals are only evidence, and no estoppel in his favor, and hence he is not precluded from denying other recitals in the instrument that operate against him.—Stoever v. Whitman, 6 Binn., Pa. 416.

essence of the contract, that is, where, unless the facts recited exist, the contract, it is presumed, would not have been made.[41] The doctrine of estoppel does not extend to mere descriptive matter or statements or recitals which are immaterial and not contractual or essential to the purposes of the instrument.[42]

d. Extent of Estoppel

A recital will not operate as an estoppel to deny a fact not necessarily inconsistent therewith, and it does not work an estoppel in a collateral action.

A recital will not operate as an estoppel to deny a fact not necessarily inconsistent with the recital,[43] and, consequently, it may be an estoppel for some purposes and not for others.[44]

A recital may be limited in its operation to the land conveyed.[45]

In collateral actions. A recital works an estoppel only in an action founded on the deed or brought to enforce rights arising under it; and while in a collateral action it may constitute evidence against the one party or the other, it is not conclusive.[46]

48. Recitals of heirship
(1) Recital in deed that former owner died intestate leaving him surviving no other heir than grantor would be binding on parties to deed on theory of estoppel.—In re Marsh, 272 N.Y.S. 807, 152 Misc. 454.
(2) Where heirs did not merely transfer their right to accept the successions of their ancestors as irregular heirs, but transferred their interest in land by warranty deeds, the deeds amounted in effect to a warranty that they were legal heirs.—Jackson v. United Gas Public Service Co., 198 So. 633, 196 La. 1.

49. Description of grantee
Parties claiming under deed are bound by its recitals as to name and residence of grantee.—Holland v. Blanchard, Tex.Civ.App., 262 S.W. 97.

50. Estate in fee simple
The grantor of an estate in fee simple may thereafter be estopped from denying that he conveyed such an estate, on the principle that, when one has by his deed affirmed or covenanted, or by his act admitted, that a fact is true, he cannot thereafter deny or contradict it.—Weaver v. Drake, 198 P. 45, 79 Okl. 277.

51. Conveyance of entire interest
A mortgagee, executing and delivering foreclosure deed to one of two mortgagors for entire interest in mortgaged realty, is estopped to assert title to one-third undivided interest, conveyed to mortgagee by such mortgagor on date of execution of mortgage.—North Carolina Joint Stock Land Bank of Durham v. Moss, 2 S.E.2d 378, 215 N.C. 445.

52. Materiality of recital
(1) Where the date of an instrument is immaterial, as is frequently the case, a party is not concluded by his signature to show that the date thereof is not the true one.—Jackson v. Bard, 4 Johns., N.Y., 230, 4 Am.D. 267—21 C.J. p 1094 note 38.
(2) On the other hand, if the date is material and injustice would result from a denial of the date as recited in the instrument, the party will be estopped to deny the date.—White v. Hughes, Mo.App., 88 S.W.2d 268.
21 C.J. p 1094 note 39.

b. Title

(1) In general

(2) References to prior instruments in general

(3) Recital making deed subject to outstanding interest

(1) In General

The grantor and grantee may be estopped to deny recitals as to title contained in the deed.

As a general rule, a grantor is estopped to deny recitals as to title contained in his deed.[54] Accordingly, a grantor cannot, as against his grantee, set up a title in a third person contrary to a recital in his own deed.[55]

The grantee may be estopped by a recital of the grantor's title,[56] provided he claims under the deed and not by title paramount.[57] Indeed, it has been stated that a recital declaring the reversion to be in the grantor will estop the grantee from setting up a paramount title.[58]

(2) References to Prior Instruments in General

A deed referring to a will or conveyance as the source of title will estop one claiming thereunder from denying the validity of the will or conveyance; and a recital of one deed in another binds the parties and their privies by matters subsequent.

A deed which refers to a will or conveyance as the source of title will estop one claiming thereunder from denying the genuineness and validity of the will or conveyance.[59]

As a general rule, a recital of one deed in another binds the parties and those who claim under them[60] by matters subsequent.[61] Such a recital may take the place of a deed and thus form a muniment of the title.[62]

(3) Recital Making Deed Subject to Outstanding Interest

A grantee is estopped to deny the validity of any outstanding interest to which his deed recites that the conveyance is subject.

As a general rule, a grantee is estopped to deny the validity of any outstanding interest, to which his deed recites that the conveyance to him is subject.[63] Thus where the deed so recites, the grantee is estopped to deny the validity of an easement,[64] lease,[65] or lien.[66]

53. Estoppel to deny existence of agreement

A recital in a deed that a certain agreement had been previously made between the parties is equivalent to making the agreement anew and will estop the parties from saying that there was no agreement.—Ball v. Hancock, 82 Ky. 107—21 C.J. p 1095 note 53.

54. Ky.—Walton's Adm'r v. Rogers, 221 S.W. 876, 188 Ky. 353.
Tex.—Mid-Texas Petroleum Co. v. Colcord, Civ.App., 235 S.W. 710.

Quantity of grantor's estate

Recitations in deed to cotenant's widow as to grantor's estate being undivided one-half interest estopped grantor from afterward asserting title to whole.—Redmond v. Gillis, 178 N.E. 504, 346 Ill. 223.

Disclaiming title

Where grantors' deed recited grantors made deed to grantee to whom land justly belonged because grantors never had interest therein, such deed, coupled with grantors' acceptance back of deed, granting life estate, estopped them or any one claiming through them from claiming title.—Cooper v. Cooper, 279 S.W. 615, 212 Ky. 454.

Estoppel of grantor

Grantor, having set out in deed that its title was acquired from certain person by certain act of sale, cannot subsequently urge that such person had no title to convey.—Reliance Homestead Ass'n v. Brink, 137 So. 52, 173 La. 331.

65. Ill.—Luly Stores Co. v. Hartman, 235 Ill.App. 319.
Okl.—Schuman v. Campbell, 83 P.2d 549, 183 Okl. 553.

Where deed did not convey land subject to lease, or in terms create any rights in favor of lessee, but merely recited, as an exception to the operation of a covenant in the deed, that the premises were free from encumbrances, except the lease, etc., grantee was not estopped as against lessee from claiming that she was not bound by the lease.—Hixon v. Starr, 136 N.E. 186, 242 Mass. 371.

66. U.S.—Mathis v. Hemingway, C.C.A.Ark., 24 F.2d 951.

However, the acceptance of a deed, which merely recites that it is subject to any rights which may have been acquired by a third person does not admit that any rights have been acquired by such person.[67]

c. Power to Convey

One executing a conveyance reciting that he is empowered to convey is estopped to deny such recital, but a principal is not estopped to deny the authority of an agent as recited in the deed.

One who executes a conveyance of land which recites that he is empowered to convey is estopped to deny such recital[68] as effectually as if it had been an express covenant.[69]

On the other hand, where one executes a deed for another as attorney in fact, the person for whom he assumes to act is not estopped to deny his authority as recited in the deed.[70] Claimants under a deed executed under a power of attorney are not estopped by the recitals of the power of attorney to show a title in the attorney different from that which the power represents him to have.[71]

d. Consideration

A recital of consideration in a deed is conclusive for some, but not for all, purposes.

According to a few early cases the recital of consideration in a deed is conclusive.[72] The true rule, however, would appear to be that the recital is binding for the purpose of giving effect to the operative words of the deed, and that the grantor may not question the reality or adequacy of the consideration for the purpose of defeating the conveyance;[73] but that for any other purpose it may be shown that the consideration was not paid in whole or in part, or that it was not paid as expressed in the deed but in some other manner.[74]

e. Description

Recitals simply by way of description of the land intended to be conveyed operate as admissions as to the identity of the land, but do not raise an estoppel as to the title.

Recitals simply by way of description of the land intended to be conveyed, while admissions as to the identity of the land,[75] do not raise an estoppel as to the title thereto.[76]

Conveyance subject to option holder's rights

Where realty was conveyed to defendant subject "to such rights as the person holding the option may have," defendant could inquire into the validity of, or consideration for, plaintiff's option to buy to establish, if it could, that plaintiff had acquired no rights thereunder.—Mandel v. National Ass'n Bldg. Corporation, 187 N.Y.S. 4, 195 App.Div. 576.

Deed "subject to all liens and taxes thereon"

Acceptance of a deed which merely recites that it is "subject nevertheless to all liens of mortgages and taxes thereon" does not admit that there were any such liens.—Purdy v. Coar, 17 N.E. 352, 109 N.Y. 448, 453, 4 Am.S.R. 491—21 C.J. p 1092 note 26.

It has been held that recitals in a deed made in the execution of a power of sale that it is made in pursuance of the sale under such power of attorney and that all the terms of the power have been complied with, such as advertisement, public sale, etc., does not estop the maker and those claiming under him from showing the contrary.—Pennington v. Palmer, 176 S.E. 697, 49 Ga.App. 540, conforming to Palmer v. Pennington, 175 S.E. 380, 179 Ga. 76.

Recital as mere receipt

"A receipt is always open to explanation, and this acknowledgment, although under seal, is nothing more than a receipt, for the seal gives it no additional solemnity."—Wilkinson v. Scott, 17 Miss. 249, 256.

Showing true consideration

A recital in a conveyance of a consideration of less than one hundred dollars, allegedly made for the purpose of avoiding payment of the federal stamp tax, does not estop the parties to the conveyance from proving the true consideration which was much larger than that recited.—Home Financiers' Building & Loan Ass'n v. Michael, 177 A. 503, 117 Pa.Super. 391.

Deed as gift

Or.L. § 798, providing that there shall be a conclusive presumption of the truth of facts recited in a written instrument as between the parties thereto, but that the statute shall not apply to recitals of consideration does not preclude a grantee from showing that the deed, although reciting a consideration of two thousand dollars, was in fact a voluntary deed intended as a gift or advancement.—Fletcher v. Title of adjacent owner

The mere mention of an adjoining tract of land, such as the H tract, in describing the location of the

A grantee is ordinarily bound by the description contained in his deed and is estopped to claim more land than is therein described.[77] However, to operate as an estoppel the description, according to the rule governing recitals generally, see § 37 b supra, must be definite and certain.[78]

Reference to map. A map referred to in a deed may serve as evidence of the location and surroundings of the property to be conveyed, without operating as an estoppel.[79] On the other hand, it may, when referred to in a deed as containing a correct description of property to be conveyed, become such a part of the deed as to estop the parties thereto from denying the correctness of such part of the contents of the map as is essential to the description of the property.[80]

f. Exceptions or Reservations

Ordinarily a grantee in a deed will be concluded by recitals therein making exceptions or reservations in favor of the grantor or a third person unless he claims the reserved interest under an independent title.

The grantee in a deed will be concluded by recitals therein limiting the quantity or extent of the interest conveyed and making reservations in favor of the grantor or third person.[81] However, the grantee will not be estopped by such reservation or exception from setting up his claim to the reserved interest under an independent title.[82]

However, it has been held that a grantee under a deed containing a reservation or exception in favor of a stranger to the conveyance is not estopped to deny its efficacy.—Beardslee v. New Berlin Light & Power Co., 100 N.E. 434, 207 N.Y. 34, Ann.Cas.1914B 1287—21 C.J. p 1095 note 52 [a].
Reservation of timber rights
(1) Under a statute providing that when a grantee accepts a deed and enters thereunder, he will be bound by the covenants contained therein, a grantee accepting a deed becomes bound by the recitals therein reserving the timber on all the lots conveyed.—Field v. Hargis, 151 S.E. 379, 169 Ga. 670.
(2) Where a father deeded lands to his children reserving the timber for himself, and the children accepted the deed, and divided the property executing mutual deeds to each other, one claiming through a child was estopped from claiming the timber because the acceptance by the child of the deed reserving the timber was an express recognition of the father's right to the timber.—Continental Realty Co. v. Bolen, 242 S.W. 6, 195 Ky. 219.
Reservation of condemnation award
Where grantee took deed subject to an exception of any awards that might be made to premises conveyed for widening of street and subsequently executed a conveyance of same property to another purchaser with clause expressly reserving to original grantor the amount of any future award, deed executed by grantee was indication of her knowledge of grantor's claim, and grantee was estopped from asserting to contrary, on property being reconveyed to her by deed which did not contain reservation of award to grantor.—Application of Mazzone, 22 N.E.2d 315, 281 N.Y. 129, 123 A.L.R. 1467, reversing 4 N.Y.S.2d 1, 254 App.Div. 104, motion granted 16 N.E.2d 853, 278 N.Y. 707, reargument denied Mazzone v. Tex.—El Paso Land Improvement Co. v. Crawford, Com.App., 292 S.W. 518, reversing, Civ.App., 280 S.W. 914.
Absence of title in grantor
To make a reservation in favor of the grantor effective against the grantee, it is not necessary that good title to the land be shown in the grantor at the time the deed was executed.—Greene v. White, Tex., 153 S.W.2d 575, reversing White v. Greene, Com.App., 129 S.W.2d 801.
Persons ratifying deed
Recitals in deed reserving mineral rights in favor of grantor are binding on wife of grantee and her grantees where they ratified the deed containing the reservation.—Greene v. White, supra.

82. Previously acquired title
(1) A deed cannot by reservation alone estop the grantee from claiming any interest he already had in the land.—Eastern Gulf Oil Co. v. Lovelace, 221 S.W. 544, 188 Ky 238.
(2) The fact that mortgagees received from their mortgagor a warranty deed of a township, excepting therefrom a tract including the disputed land, does not estop the mortgagee from thereafter claiming the disputed land under the mortgage.—Webber v. Austin, 121 A. 673, 123 Me. 95.
Subsequently acquired title
The grantee will not be estopped from setting up title to the reserved interest afterward acquired through a source hostile to the title of the grantor.—Champlain & St. Lawrence R. Co. v. Valentine, 19 Barb., N.Y., 484—21 C.J. p 1095 note 50.
Title by prescription

The recitals of a deed, excepting out of the conveyance lands embraced therein, must, to work an estoppel, be as definite and descriptive as are required by law in a deed of conveyance, either by their presence in the deed relied on as an estoppel, or by reference to another in which they are sufficiently set out.[83]

§ 39. In Mortgages

As a general rule, the parties to a mortgage are estopped to deny the material recitals therein unless the mortgage presents a case for reformation.

Unless a mortgage presents a case for reformation,[84] as a general rule the parties thereto are estopped to deny the material recitals which the instrument contains,[85] such as recitals as to the consideration,[86] the indebtedness,[87] the existence,[88] description,[89] and nature[90] of the property mortgaged, the title[91] or interest and estate mortgaged,[92] the nature and identity of the mortgagor,[93] and prior encumbrances.[94]

However, as in the case of deeds, see § 37 supra, the rule does not extend to mere descriptive matter, statements, or recitals which are immaterial or merely evidentiary and not contradictory or essential to the purposes of the instrument.[95] strictions does not preclude grantee from showing destruction of restrictions by prescription, including his own adverse user.—Robert v. O'Connell, 169 N.E. 487, 269 Mass. 532.

88. Chattels
(1) Where a mortgagor by his mortgage sets forth a certain stock of goods, locating them at a certain house, he is estopped in a suit to foreclose the mortgage from denying the truth of the same, or claiming that the mortgage is illegal because there were no such goods.—Marable v. Mayer, 78 Ga. 60.

(2) However, in an action by a chattel mortgagee against the mortgagor for conversion of the mortgaged property the mortgagor is not estopped by covenants of ownership and warranty in the mortgage from showing that the property in question never existed and could not have been converted.—Farmers' State Bank of Knox v. Bowles, 203 N.W. 903, 52 N.D. 553, 40 A.L.R. 377.

Estoppel against mortgagee
(1) A recital in a chattel mortgage that party allegedly signing as surety was owner and mortgagor does not estop mortgagee to deny such party's title, where mortgagee relied solely on mortgagors' title.—Perkins v. First Nat. Bank, 56 P.2d 639, 47 Ariz. 376, certiorari denied Perkins v. Honorable Supreme Court of State of Arizona, 57 S.Ct. 20, 299 U.S. 540, 81 L.Ed. 397.

Residence of mortgagor
Where a chattel mortgage recites that mortgagor resides in a certain parish, mortgagee is estopped to assert the contrary as against an innocent purchaser of the mortgaged property.—General Finance Co. of Louisiana v. Evans, La.App., 196 So. 581.

94. Estoppel against mortgagor
A mortgage covenant that the premises were unencumbered will not estop the mortgagor from asserting the existence of a prior mortgage where the mortgagee had actual knowledge of its existence when his mortgage was executed.—Danielson v. Tessum, 227 N.W. 852, 178 Minn. 514.

Estoppel against mortgagee
(1) Ordinarily, a mortgagee who accepts a mortgage which recites that it is subject to another mortgage on the same property is estopped thereby, and he may not defeat or impair such other mortgage by denying its priority or validity at the time he took it to the amount of it as recited in his own mortgage.—Moffatt v. Fouts, 160 P. 1137, 99 Kan. 118—21 C.J. p 1089 note 93 [d] (1), p 1096 note 63 [a].

(2) Accordingly, junior mortgagee, whose mortgage is made expressly subject to prior mortgages, is estopped from thereafter attacking such prior mortgages on the ground that they were given, without consideration, with the mutual intent to defraud creditors of mortgagor.—Nichols v. Jackson County Bank, 298 P. 908, 911, 136 Or. 302, citing Corpus Juris—21 C.J. p 1072 note 31.

(3) Such junior mortgagee is also estopped from asserting that prior mortgage was in effect an assignment for the benefit of creditors.—Smith-McCord Dry Goods Co. v John B. Farwell Co., 50 P. 149, 6 Okl. 318.

(4) Where a second security deed recited existence of original security deed and lien, grantee in second deed could not obtain reformation of original deed on denying truth of recital by showing that it was not intended that disputed land should be covered by original deed.—Rawson v. Brosnan, 1 S.E.2d 423, 187 Ga. 624.

(5) Mortgagee who accepts a mortgage which recites that it is subject to another mortgage on the same property given to a foreign corporation, however, is not estopped thereby from showing that the foreign corporation's mortgage is void because made while the corporation was doing business in the state without having complied with certain statutory conditions, since otherwise the purpose of the statute would be defeated.—Dunn v. Utah Serum Co., 238 P. 245, 65 Utah 527.

§ 40. In Bonds

a. In general
b. Circumstances under which estoppel not operative

a. In General

As a general rule parties who execute a bond are estopped to deny the material recitals therein.

The holder of a bond is entitled to rely on the facts recited therein,[96] and, as a general rule, subject to certain limitations which appear infra in subdivision b of this section, the principal[97] and sureties[98] in a bond are estopped to deny the material recitals therein, irrespective of the obligee's knowledge as to their truth.[99]

Applications of rule. This rule has been applied to various classes of bonds.[1] Thus the rule has been applied to bonds for release of attachment;[2] bonds of executors and administrators,[3] of guardians,[4] of public officers;[5] bonds to indemnify obligee for giving security for costs for obligor;[6] bonds to procure discharge of garnishee;[7] contractors' bonds.[8] Further, the rule has been applied

Estoppel of husband to assert title
Where wife conveyed certain property to her husband by a deed which he did not record, and thereafter a deed of trust was executed by both to secure a loan, which recited that, if the loan was paid, the trustee should reconvey the land to the wife, her heirs, and assigns, at her request and cost, such deed of trust did not estop the husband from denying that she was the owner of the property.—Tyler v. Currier, 81 P. 319, 147 Cal. 31—21 C.J. p 1069 note 8.

Validity of contract
(1) It has been held that sureties on a contractor's bond are precluded from asserting the invalidity of the contract for defects in its execution where the bond recites the existence of the contract.—City of Minneapolis v. Republic Creosoting Co., 201 N.W. 414, 161 Minn. 178—Bell v. Keyland, 113 N.W. 271, 102 Minn. 213, 120 Am.S.R. 621, 13 L.R.A.,N.S., 793.

(2) The obligors on a contractor's bond are estopped to deny a recital in the bond that the agents making the contract were authorized so to do.—Potts v. Longest & Tessier Co., 103 S.E. 279, 86 W.Va. 157.

(3) However there is also authority for the view that a surety is not estopped by recitals in the bond to assert the invalidity of the contract.—State v. Kuhner, 140 N.E. 344, 107 Ohio St. 406—Southern Surety Co. v. Moores-Coney Co., 163 N.E. 575, 29 Ohio App. 310.

by the courts to employees' indemnity bonds;[9] fidelity bonds;[10] injunction bonds;[11] replevin,[12] forthcoming, or delivery bonds;[13] taxpayers' bonds;[14] traverse bonds;[15] and underwriting bonds.[16]

Appeal or supersedeas bonds. The general rule, that parties who execute a bond are estopped to deny the material recitals therein, is applicable to an appeal or supersedeas bond.[17] Accordingly, by the recital of a judgment in an appeal or supersedeas bond, the obligors are estopped to deny the fact of its existence,[18] validity,[19] or amount[20] as recited in the bond.

Construction. In determining whether recitals in a bond create an estoppel, the recitals must be construed in connection with the circumstances under which the bond was executed.[21]

b. Circumstances under Which Estoppel Not Operative

Under certain circumstances a recital in a bond will not work an estoppel, as where it is without consideration, relates to immaterial matters, or is indefinite, etc.

Under certain circumstances recitals in a bond do not operate as an estoppel.[22]

Such recitals work no estoppel where they are without consideration;[23] where they consist of matter immaterial to the object of the instrument,[24] or relate to past transactions, which form no part of the consideration for the execution of the bond;[25] where the instrument in which the recitals relied on occur has fully performed its office and in

Performance of contract

Fine for contempt

An appeal bond given by a judgment debtor in supplementary proceedings, conditioned to pay a fine imposed for contempt if the order appealed from was affirmed, estopped him, after affirmance, to question the legality of the fine.—Soule v. Lookstein, 151 N.Y.S. 67.

Amount of recovery

Where supersedeas bond states that money judgment for certain amount was rendered, obligors are estopped to deny amount of judgment, but obligees are limited in recovery on bond to amount recoverable, had bond been properly conditioned.—Gibson Oil Co. v. Hayes Equipment Mfg. Co., 67 P.2d 8, 180 Okl. 37—Williams v. Edwards, 22 P. 2d 1026, 163 Okl. 246.

legal contemplation does not exist at all;[26] where the recitals are a nullity having been inadvertently inserted by the clerk of the court in which the bond was given;[27] where the recitals are contradicted by the record of the proceedings in which the bond was given,[28] or by other recitals in the instrument itself;[29] where the recitals were inserted in the bond through mistake,[30] or where the bond was procured by fraud,[31] which reached the substance of the consideration.[32]

In addition, there is no estoppel where the recitals are not definite and certain,[33] where the action is not founded on the bond but wholly collateral to it,[34] or where the bond is void.[35] A recital of a "generality to be done," such as the condition of payment in the bond, will not operate as an estoppel.[36]

It has also been held that one cannot invoke the estoppel unless he has accepted and relied on the recitals in the bond, in genuine innocence and sincerity, to his actual prejudice.[37]

Recitals in an additional and cumulative bond which show no agreement that the sureties thereon shall be primarily liable will not operate as an estoppel in favor of the sureties on the original obligation.[38] However, the obligors in a underwriting bond are estopped by its recitals to set up the invalidity of the original bond by reason of formal defects.[39]

Death of obligee. A bond reciting that the obligor was a prisoner at the suit of a nominal plaintiff will not estop the sureties to show that the latter died before the bond was executed.[40]

E. REQUISITES, VALIDITY, AND CONSTRUCTION OF DEED

§ 41. Execution

To work an estoppel by deed, the instrument must have been executed and must have been the voluntary act of the grantor, although the necessity for sealing, acknowledging, and recording the instrument may depend on statutory requirements.

A grantor is not estopped by a deed which he has not executed.[41]

The principle governing the doctrine of estoppel by recitals in sealed instruments is applicable only where the existence of the instrument as the act of the party is admitted or proved.[42]

Furthermore, the execution of the instrument must be the voluntary act of the grantor.[43] A party will not be prejudiced by the recitals in a deed executed under judicial compulsion;[44] a fortiori is this so where the deed describes premises other than those described in the complaint and in the decree of sale.[45]

Seal. To create an estoppel by deed the instrument must be under seal,[46] unless an unsealed instrument is by statute placed on the same footing as a sealed instrument.[47]

Acknowledgment and recordation. In the absence of a statutory requirement, a deed need not be acknowledged[48] or recorded[49] in order to operate as an estoppel.

§ 42. Delivery and Acceptance

To work an estoppel by deed the instrument must have been delivered and accepted.

An estoppel by deed cannot arise against the grantor until the instrument which is claimed to create the estoppel has become effective by delivery;[50] but one holding a deed to himself and others and claiming the land under it cannot deny its validity as a conveyance to the other grantees for want of delivery.[51]

A grantee is not estopped by a deed which he has never accepted or authorized to be accepted.[52] However, ratification of acceptance by the attorney in fact of the grantee estops the grantee to dispute the validity of the deed.[53]

§ 43. Validity

a. In general
b. Fraud and mistake
c. Estoppel by covenants in invalid deed

a. In General

An invalid deed ordinarily does not operate as an estoppel; and to work an estoppel, the parties must be competent to make the deed effectual as a contract.

A deed having no validity cannot be made the basis of an estoppel;[54] and a void instrument will not operate by way of estoppel so as to vest a subsequently acquired estate in the grantee.[55] Neither does a void instrument inure by way of estoppel to the benefit of a person in adverse possession of the land at the time it was conveyed.[56]

Nevertheless, a deed which is valid as between the parties to it, although invalid as to third persons, may operate as an estoppel against the grantor and those in privity with him;[57] and where a deed is valid as to one of several grantors, he may be estopped, although it is void as to the others.[58]

An inoperative conveyance by one tenant in common which is rendered effectual by a release from the other tenants in common will operate as an estoppel;[59] and one who, owning land, undertakes without authority to convey such land as the attorney in fact to one who has no interest whatever in the land is estopped from asserting title as against one who claims under the deed so executed.[60]

Incompetency of parties. In order to work an estoppel the parties to a deed must be sui juris, competent to make it effectual as a contract.[61] Specific applications of this doctrine will be found treated under other titles in this work.

b. Fraud and Mistake

A party is not estopped to question his own deed where it has been procured by fraud; and a recital inserted in a deed through mistake ordinarily will not operate as an estoppel.

The general rule that a party will be estopped to question his own deed does not apply where the deed has been procured by fraud,[62] although there has been some conflict of authority as to whether relief can be granted in an action at law.[63]

Mistake. While there is some authority to the contrary,[64] it is generally held that a recital inserted in a deed through mistake will not in equity be permitted to operate as an estoppel, so as to exclude the truth.[65] However, it has been held that, where a tract of land is granted in clear and unmistakable terms, the grantor and those claiming under him are estopped to say in a court of law that the land thus described in the deed was inserted by mistake, and that another piece was intended,[66] although there are decisions which hold that the mistake may be shown by the grantor for the purpose of reducing the damages for covenants broken.[67]

c. Estoppel by Covenants in Invalid Deed

The mere fact that an invalid deed contains covenants of warranty ordinarily will not make the deed operative by way of estoppel.

As a general rule, where the deed is invalid, the mere fact that it contains covenants of warranty will not make it operative by way of estoppel, for to make a warranty binding, there must be some estate conveyed to which the warranty may be annexed.[68] In order for a covenant to work an estoppel, it must be in a deed good and valid in law as well as in equity.[69]

However, there are decisions holding that a deed which is void as a conveyance for want of words of inheritance[70] or grant,[71] but which contains a covenant of warranty, may operate by way of estoppel to prevent circuity of action.

§ 44. Construction

a. In general
b. Truth apparent from whole instrument

a. In General

In determining whether a deed creates an estoppel, the instrument should be construed in its entirety; the instrument must be precise and certain and the intention clear and unambiguous.

In determining whether a deed creates an estoppel, every part of it should be given effect, if this can be done, and if the deed evidences conflicting intentions on its face, the object of the grant being considered, effect should be given to what may appear to be the controlling intention of the grantor.[72]

The estoppel will be limited by the intention of the parties.[73]

Certainty. In order to create an estoppel the instrument by which the estoppel is claimed must be precise and certain and the intention clear and unambiguous.[74]

b. Truth Apparent from Whole Instrument

Where the truth is apparent on an instrument which otherwise works an estoppel, ordinarily the parties will not be estopped from taking advantage of it.

Where the truth is apparent on a deed or instrument which otherwise works an estoppel, the parties will not be estopped from taking advantage of it,[75] as, for instance, that the grantor had no title,[76] or only a naked possibility.[77] However, the rule does not apply to a distinct undertaking for the transfer of after-acquired property since, in such an undertaking, an estoppel exists because of the covenant of warranty.[78]

§ 45. Extent of Estoppel

An estoppel cannot be extended beyond the exact terms of the admission.

An estoppel cannot be extended beyond the exact terms of the admission so as to preclude a party from establishing facts not inconsistent therewith.[79]

While the estoppel is in all cases coextensive with the estate or interest which the grantor attempts to convey and warrant,[80] it is confined to the subject matter of the conveyance,[81] and will not extend to objects that the parties cannot reasonably be supposed to have had in view,[82] or be

Extent of particular estoppels
(1) That plaintiff's lease was expressly subject to terms of third party's lease estopped plaintiff from denying the validity of such third party's lease, but not from claiming exclusive right to drill for oil in creek bed where third party's lease did not purport to convey creek bed.—Carter Oil Co. v. Delworth, C.C.A. Ill., 120 F.2d 589.

(2) Where defendants gave note and mortgage to married woman and thereafter conveyed the mortgaged land to her husband, and thereafter she and her husband conveyed the land to defendants by deed containing full covenants including a warranty that the land was free from all encumbrances, her joinder in the deed released her interest as mortgagee, and administrator of her estate was "estopped" from asserting any interest in the land but was not "estopped" from proceeding against defendants on the note as an unsecured claim.—Tripp v. Longston, 10 S.E.2d 916, 218 N.C. 295.

(3) While the fact that defendant holds a deed to a part of the property in controversy from one who was a common source of title for both plaintiff and defendant estops defendant from claiming that the common source did not have title, it does not estop him from claiming that the common source did not, by valid deed, convey his title to plaintiff.—Webber v. F. PERSONS FOR AND AGAINST WHOM ESTOPPEL ARISES

§ 46. General Rule

Estoppel by deed is operative only between the parties to the deed and their privies.

Estoppel by deed is operative only between parties to the deed and their privies; strangers to the deed are not bound by, nor can they invoke, the estoppel.[85] The rule is the same as to an estoppel to assert an after-acquired title; the parties and their privies are estopped, but strangers are not bound by,[86] nor can they invoke,[87] the estoppel. However, it has been held that the estoppel becomes operative against strangers who come in after it has become effective.[88]

Grantor's donees. Under some statutes donees of the grantor are bound by an estoppel against the grantor to the extent of the value of the estate

Estoppel to assert nuisance
The conveyance of a tract of land does not estop the grantor from complaining of the grantee's use of the land in a manner constituting a nuisance.—Off v. Exposition Coaster, 167 N.E. 782, 336 Ill. 100.

83. Conveyance of burial lots
Party who joined in conveyance without reservation of land burdened with use of part as private burial ground was not estopped to have enjoined desecration of burial ground in which her ancestors were buried by parties claiming under grantee, as it is always presumed that burial lots are not included in the sale of property surrounding them.—White v. Admission of stranger's title Stranger to deed cannot avail himself of estoppel by admission therein that he is owner of land to which grantee is claiming by adverse possession.—Smith v. Vermont Marble Co., 133 A. 355, 99 Vt. 384.

Provision in chattel mortgage that mortgagor would furnish waiver of lessor's lien will not estop lessor to claim priority, where lessor was not party to instrument.—Thigpen v. Wall Printing Corporation, La.App., 145 So. 714.

Easements
Clause in a deed, "There is also excepted a passway where it now is for the use and benefit of A. and J. during their natural life," did not estop them to claim a prescriptive right to use passway, they not being parties to deed.—Barry v. Messmer, 262 S.W. 1109, 203 Ky. 702.

Grantees in a tax deed are not concluded by a recital in a quitclaim deed executed by the record owner after the sale that a lost, unrecorded deed had been executed and delivered by him to grantee before the tax suit.—Dent v. Investors' Sec. Ass'n, 254 S.W. 1080, 300 Mo. 552.

Persons estopped by after-acquired property clause
The estoppel raised by an after-acquired property clause in a mortgage to assert that the mortgage does not cover all the property and rights which it purports to cover operates against the mortgagor corporation and persons claiming under and in privity with it, but does not operate against others not so related, who desire to contest the lien on the ground that the property in question was acquired by another in its own right.—Susquehanna Trust & Safe Deposit Co. v. United Telephone & Telegraph Co., C.C.A. Pa., 6 F.2d 179.

87. Persons adjudged interest in land
Grantor's after-acquired title will not inure to persons to whom grantee did not convey the land, but who were adjudged an interest in the land in an action to quiet title against the grantee.—Pullen v. Hart, 238 S.W. 437, 293 Mo. 61.

§ 47. Parties

Estoppel by deed is operative only between the real parties to the deed.

The doctrine of estoppel by deed is operative only between the real, as distinguished from the apparent, parties to the deed.[90]

§ 48. Parties Acting in Different Rights or Capacities

A deed made by a person individually does not estop him in a representative capacity, and a deed accepted in a representative capacity does not estop the grantee individually; but the authorities disagree as to whether a deed made in a representative capacity estops the grantor individually.

A deed made by a person individually does not estop him in a representative capacity from asserting title in those whom he represents.[91] As to whether a deed made in a representative capacity estops the grantor individually the cases are not in accord, for, while some of the courts have held that the grantor is not estopped to assert an individual right or title in derogation of the deed,[92] the general rule is to the contrary, at least where there are general covenants,[93] unless the deed expressly excepts or recognizes an interest in the grantor individually.[94] A deed accepted in a representative capacity, however, does not estop the grantee in-

In Kentucky, under a statute so providing, whenever a vendor conveys by general warranty deed a greater estate than he has, and afterward there is a claimant of the estate so conveyed who has received estate, real or personal, by gift or advancement from the vendor, such claimant is barred of recovery to the extent of the value of the estate so received.—Blankenship v. Haldeman, 10 S.W.2d 469, 226 Ky. 57.

90. Community property
A purchaser of property standing of record in the name of the wife, who is apparently the seller, may show as against the wife that the property was in fact community property notwithstanding the principle that a party cannot controvert the title of one under whom he claims as the title is in reality from the community and not from the wife.—Garlick v. (2) Formerly, however, it had been held that a conveyance by an executrix and life tenant, executed by an attorney in fact in her name, adding the word "executrix," and in his name as agent, will estop her as to her life estate.—Phillips v. Hornsby, 70 Ala. 414.

One not a purchaser for value cannot invoke the principle that a grantor conveying property in a representative capacity is estopped to assert an individual title in derogation of the deed.—Security Trust Co. of Pottstown v. Feist, 5 A.2d 119, 333 Pa. 536.
Conveyance by agent
(1) One executing mortgage as agent for mortgagor is estopped from denying validity of mortgage on ground that agent herself owned land involved.—Hoover v. Pennington, 141 So. 517, 19 La.App. 779.
(2) Attorneys in fact, who executed an assignment of an oil and gas lease for their principal and "in their own right," and who were afterward made sole devisees of their principal under his will, would be estopped to question the validity of the assignment.—Kentucky Coke Co. v. Keystone Gas Co., C.C.A.Ky., 296 F. 320, certiorari denied 45 S.Ct. 92, 266 U.S. 605, 69 L.Ed. 464.

Conveyance by executor
(1) One who, as executor, conveyed land by warranty deed was estopped to claim, as against grantee, that strip included was public road because of alleged dedication.—Clokey v. Wabash Ry. Co., 187 N.E. 475, 353 Ill. 349.

Conveyance by guardian
(1) Where a guardian makes an absolute conveyance of land to a purchaser at guardian's sale, he is thereby estopped from claiming, in his individual capacity, against the purchaser, an interest in the land conveyed.—Simpson-Fell Oil Co. v. Stanolind Oil & Gas Co., Tex., 125 S.W.2d 263, affirming Stanolind Oil & Gas Co. v. Simpson-Fell Oil Co., Civ.App., 85 S.W.2d 325, and reversed on other grounds Simpson-Fell Oil Co. v. Stanolind Oil & Gas Co., Sup., 146 S.W.2d 723—Rutherford v. McGee, Civ.App., 241 S.W. 629.
(2) This rule obtains without regard to a covenant of warranty contained in the deed.—Surtees v. Hobson, Tex.Civ.App., 4 S.W.2d 245, affirmed, Com.App., 13 S.W.2d 245.
(3) A general warranty of title in a guardian's deed, however, is binding on the guardian, and prevents him from claiming in his individual capacity an interest in the land conveyed.—Rutherford v. McGee, supra.
(4) The fact that the purchaser at a guardian's sale had the title examined by his attorney, who gave the opinion that the guardian's sale conveyed the title, does not prevent the deed from operating as an estoppel against the claim by the guardian in his individual capacity of an interest in the land.—Rutherford v. McGee, supra.

(2) President of corporate mortgagor, who signed bond and mortgage and personal guaranty of deficiency, and was present when descriptions in mortgage were read, was estopped to claim that mortgage was not lien on two of his own lots included therein.—Bankers' Trust Co. v. dividually;[95] and as a rule, the doctrine of title by estoppel does not apply, in the absence of personal covenants, to a title subsequently acquired in a different right.[96]

A deed executed by one as agent for another, particularly where it recites that he has authority to convey, estops him and his subsequent grantees from denying such authority.[97] One who conveys land as executor is estopped to deny that he was executor and had received letters testamentary from the probate court;[98] and the principle also applies to administrators.[99] Furthermore an executor is estopped to deny that his exercise of his discretionary power as executor to sell testator's real estate was for the best interest of the estate after receiving full consideration for the land sold.[1]

It is ordinarily held that the execution of conveyances by public officers in their capacity as such will not estop them from attacking the title thus conveyed,[2] but there is some authority to the contrary.[3]

§ 49. States or Municipalities

The doctrine of estoppel by deed generally applies against the state and municipal corporations.

While there are some decisions which hold that on principles of public policy the sovereign cannot be estopped,[4] it is generally held that the doctrine of estoppel by deed applies against the state, and it will not be allowed to assert anything in derogation of its grant.[5]

However, the deed of a state officer to land sold for taxes which contains no covenants and does not purport to convey any right, title, or interest of the state other than its lien for the taxes assessed will not preclude it from asserting a claim to the land in question.[6] Further, the state is not estopped by the unauthorized deeds of its officers or agents.[7]

Municipal corporation. A municipal corporation is estopped by its grants the same as the state.[8] However, a grant of land by a municipal corporation will not estop it from passing laws in the exercise of the police power, by which the land will be rendered useless for the purposes of the grant.[9]

§ 50. Privies

The privies of a grantor or grantee are estopped to the same extent as the original parties to the deed and may, in like manner, take advantage of the estoppel.

grantee[11] are estopped to the same extent as the original parties to the deed, and may in like manner take advantage of the estoppel. The estoppel of a grantor as to an after-acquired title applies against those in privity with him the same as in other cases of estoppel.[12]

§ 51. What Constitutes Privity

Privity means the mere succession of rights or the derivation of rights by one person from another and the holding in subordination to the latter.

In the law of estoppel by deed, privity means: (1) Mere succession of rights, that is, the devolution, in whole or in part, of the rights and duties of one person upon another. (2) The derivation of rights by one person from another and the holding in subordination to the latter.[13]

§ 52. Who Are Privies Generally

A person is not bound as a privy by an estoppel against another, nor may he urge it, unless he succeeds to that other's possession or holds in subordination to it.

A privy to a deed is a party to the deed or a legal representative of, or successor in title to, a party,[14] or one who has succeeded to some right or obligation which one of the parties to the act derived through the act or incurred under it.[15]

A person is not bound as a privy by an estoppel against another, nor may he urge it, unless he succeeds to that other's possession or holds in subordination to it; persons claiming under an independent title are not estopped.[16] If, on the other hand, a person does so succeed or does so hold, he is bound by the estoppel and may urge it the same as the original party to the deed.[17] A creditor levying on land may not take advantage of an estoppel created by a deed thereof to the debtor, unless he buys in the property;[18] but a levying creditor is bound by an estoppel against the debtor as grantor.[19] A purchaser at execution sale may take advantage of an estoppel arising from the deed by which the debtor acquired title,[20] and he is estopped by a deed made by the debtor before the sale.[21] A purchaser under an attachment levied on property is bound by a conveyance of the property executed before levy of the attachment.[22]

§ 53. Heirs and Devisees

An heir or devisee is in privity with the ancestor or testator and may urge an estoppel arising in his favor, and he is bound by an estoppel against the ancestor or testator, unless, in some jurisdictions, he claims under an independent title.

Heirs and devisees are in privity with the ancestor or testator and may urge an estoppel arising in his favor.[23] For the same reason they are bound by an estoppel against the ancestor or testator;[24] and this is so whether the ancestor had title at the time of the conveyance or subsequently acquired it.[25] However, a warranty deed binds the grantor's heirs only to the extent of the property received by them from the grantor's estate;[26] and no estoppel arises against the heirs as to an after-acquired title by the ancestors by reason of a conveyance by the ancestor which conveys only the interest the grantor had in the land and not the land itself.[27]

As a general rule the heirs or devisees are estopped only where they claim through the ancestor or testator; ordinarily an heir or devisee claiming an independent title in himself is not estopped.[28] Nevertheless important limitations of the proposition are recognized in some jurisdictions, where, if heirs or devisees have received property from the estate equal in value to the land conveyed, they are estopped to claim by an independent title the land conveyed,[29] and if the property received from the estate is less in value than the estate conveyed they will be barred of a recovery to the extent of the value of the property received;[30] but this is the extent of the limitation, and heirs or devisees of the grantor are bound only to the extent of the property received by them from the estate.[31] In some states the rule has been modified so as not to estop the heir in such case, even though he has received assets, unless administration has been taken out and a breach occurs after the estate has been settled.[32] The rule has been denied altogether in other jurisdictions where, by statute, lineal and collateral warranties with all their incidents are abolished.[33]

The right of a grantee to assert an estoppel as to after-acquired property inures to those claiming under him.[35] This is allowed, however, not because of privity between the grantee and the sub-grantee, but because the covenant of warranty in the original deed runs with the land.[36]

IV. ESTOPPEL BY SIMPLE CONTRACT

§ 55. In General

a. In general
b. Estoppel to deny facts settled by contract

a. In General

Two kinds of estoppel by contract are recognized: Estoppel to deny facts settled by contract; and estoppel arising from acts done under, or in performance of, the contract.

While it has been stated that "estoppel by contract" is a term intended to embrace all cases in which there is an actual or virtual undertaking to treat a fact as settled,[37] it is well agreed that, as stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted by the courts, there are two sorts of what has been termed "estoppel by contract," namely, estoppel to deny the truth of facts agreed on and settled by force of entering into the contract, and estoppel arising from acts done under, or in performance of, the contract.[38]

The first form of estoppel, if the contract is in writing, is analogous to certain phases of estoppel by deed, and is not in strict propriety a species of estoppel in pais, since it is wholly based on a written instrument.[39]

The second sort of estoppel by contract seems to be limited to cases where one party goes into possession of another's property in recognition of the latter's title, and it precludes the possessor from denying that title.[40] It rests, whether or not the contract is in writing, on matters in pais.[41] It does not, however, seem to fall within the scope of estoppel in pais, in the strict sense of that term, although it bears a close resemblance thereto and its practical operation is the same.[42] Elements essential to an estoppel in pais are found wanting in this sort of so-called estoppel by contract, and it seems to rest on the broad principle which precludes a party from taking inconsistent positions to another's prejudice.[43] It is therefore treated in §§ 107–129 infra, as a form of quasi estoppel.

Unlike the case of estoppel by conduct, as discussed in § 70 infra, it can seldom be an answer to estoppel by contract that the party against whom the estoppel is claimed acted in ignorance of the facts and under mistake.[44] The office of estoppel by simple contract is, it has been stated, to preclude a party from taking inconsistent positions to another's prejudice.[45] A seller who, with full knowledge of the facts, enters into an agreement relating to a refund of the price is estopped to claim that the agreement was merely colorable and made solely because the other party had obtained an unjust advantage.[46]

b. Estoppel to Deny Facts Settled by Contract

In the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, parties to a contract and their privies are estopped to deny facts agreed on or assumed in the making of the contract.

As stated in Corpus Juris, which has been quoted and cited by the courts, if, in making a contract, the parties agree on or assume the existence of a particular fact as the basis of their negotiations, they are estopped to deny the fact so long as the contract stands,[47] in the absence of fraud, accident,

Election of remedies
Under trust agreement, empowering trustee to sell collateral pledged to secure corporate note issue on corporation's default and to proceed at law or equity to protect rights of holders of notes, the corporation was estopped from objecting that the remedy by enforcement of collection of the collateral notes was inconsistent with remedy of execution sale of the collateral, especially where such judgment inured to the benefit of corporation.—Anglo-California Trust Co. v. Oakland Rys., 225 P. 452, 193 Cal. 451.

Estoppel to deny contract superseded prior arrangements
Even if a party to a contract had objections to it, after he has exe-

or mistake.[48]

There can be no estoppel as to matters not included in the contract,[49] nor is the doctrine applicable as against persons other than parties to the contract and their privies.[50] To form the basis of an estoppel by contract, except in equity, the con-cuted it his mouth is closed against any denial that it superseded all previous arrangements.

Estoppel to deny discharge of claims

Where two individuals purchased the entire stock of a corporation from original sole owners who consented to terms and executed the contract based on statement of assets and liabilities in which they approved the omission of their claims for loans and past-due salary, the original stockholders were estopped, in an action against corporation for amount of loans and past-due salary accounts, from setting up that there was no discharge of their claims.—Paul v. University Motor Sales Co., supra.

Estoppel to deny liability

(1) Where one who purchases stock and obligations of a corporation from a creditor of the company assumes payment of certain of the company's bonds secured by its mortgage, he is estopped, on foreclosure of the mortgage, to deny the company's liability on the bonds.—Old Colony Trust Co. v. Allentown & B. Rapid-Transit Co., 44 A. 319, 192 Pa. 596.

(2) Under a contract clearly showing plaintiff was indebted to defendant in some amount, plaintiff is estopped to deny he was indebted to defendant on contract date.—United Fidelity Life Ins. Co. v. Fowler, Tex.Civ.App., 38 S.W.2d 128, error dismissed.

Marshaling assets

Where a vendor who had sold on installments one of two quarter sections, each of which was subject to mortgages covering the whole, thereafter assigned the contract and notes representing the unpaid purchase money, the assignee was not estopped as against one who recovered judgment against the vendor before recordation of the assignment of the contract, etc., from insisting that the original mortgagee first exhaust the security of the quarter section not sold on installments, because, when the assignee bought the notes of the purchaser, it also took a deed to the quarter section, etc., and agreed to pay the encumbrances on both, for the agreement was made on condition that there was then owing a fixed sum on the notes of the purchaser, and that the assignee should have those notes paid to it, and the judgment creditor could assert no greater rights than the vendor, the assignor being estopped to deny the assignee's right to such notes.—Frank Lynch Co. v. National City Bank of Chicago, C.C.A.N.D., 261 F. 480.

Power of attorney

Assignee of proceeds of policies taking power of attorney to sue was estopped to assert assignor was not real party in interest, where assignee's right to sue was barred.—Keeley v. Indemnity Co. of America, 7 S.W.2d 434, 222 Mo.App. 439.

Receipts for sums due as their mother's heirs, under a charge of five hundred dollars for her benefit against land devised by their grandmother to an uncle, and releasing legacies under his will, estopped heirs who were sui juris by contract from asserting that deceased uncle's land was a trust investment of the five hundred dollars.—Winstead v. tract in all its terms must be invoked by one party against the other.[51]

§ 56. Necessity of Seal

The authorities do not agree as to whether a written instrument not under seal may create an estoppel.

Since a deed is a writing under seal, it is self-evident that an unsealed writing cannot give rise to an estoppel by deed; and, as shown supra § 41, cases may be found in which it has been stated that a writing not made under seal cannot found an estoppel as by deed. Other decisions hold that no instrument not under seal will operate as an estoppel,[52] but it does not follow that a simple written contract cannot create an estoppel analogous to estoppel by deed and of the same force and effect, in so far as it is sufficient in law to effectuate the purpose for which it was made, and indeed there is authority that it may.[53]

§ 57. Validity of Contract

Unless the contract has been fully executed, an invalid contract cannot give rise to estoppel by simple contract, although an estoppel may arise from a contract merely invalid, as distinguished from illegal or unlawful.

An estoppel by simple contract cannot be predicated on an invalid contract,[54] unless it has been fully executed.[55] However, it has been held that a party to an invalid contract which is not illegal and unlawful may be equitably estopped to dispute the validity of the contract.[56]

An estoppel cannot be based on a contract which has been abrogated.[57]

§ 58. Recitals in Contract

a. In general
b. Acknowledgment of consideration

a. In General

Persons contracting may be estopped to deny the truth of recitals in a written contract which are consistent and certain in their terms, relevant to the subject matter of the contract, and with reference to which the contract was made.

A party to a written contract may be estopped to deny the truth of recitals therein,[58] where such recitals are consistent and certain in their terms, relevant to the subject matter of the contract, and with reference to which the contract was made.[59]

However, a recital that does not amount to a precise affirmation of a fact will not estop the party to deny the fact.[60] An estoppel does not arise from a recital unless it is of the essence of the agreement,[61] or unless it constitutes a representation or warranty inducing the contract,[62] or in favor of one suing as assignor of the contract in which the recitals occur where he gave no consideration for the assignment,[63] or, unless having been accepted and acted on in good faith, it results in consequences which it would be inequitable or unjust to disturb.[64] A recital is not binding in an action not founded on the contract.[65] Recitals that the parties have inspected the property and do not rely on any representations made to them,[66] that the seller is not responsible for any representations not set forth in the contract,[67] or that the seller has made no representations to the buyer,[68] do not constitute an estoppel to assert fraudulent inducement to contract.

In determining the effect of a recital, it must be construed in connection with the whole contract.[69]

b. Acknowledgment of Consideration

A recital in a contract of receipt of consideration may not be contradicted so as to defeat the operation of the contract, but it may be contradicted for collateral purposes, and may give rise to an equitable estoppel in connection with extraneous circumstances.

While an acknowledgment of receipt of consideration as part of the contract in which it occurs may not be contradicted for the purpose of defeating the operation of the contract,[70] yet it may as a simple receipt be contradicted for collateral purposes.[71] The party making the acknowledgment may, however, be equitably estopped by extraneous circumstances to deny the receipt as against third persons who have acted on it to their detriment,[72] and even as against the other party to the contract.[73]

V. EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL; ESTOPPEL BY MISREPRESENTATION

A. GENERAL NATURE AND ESSENTIALS

1. In General

§ 59. What Constitutes

a. In general
b. Estoppel by conduct
c. Comparison of terms and principles

a. In General

Equitable estoppel or estoppel by misrepresentation is the effect of the voluntary conduct of a person whereby he is precluded, both at law and in equity, from asserting rights against another person relying on such conduct; and it arises where a person, by his acts, representations, or admissions, or even by his silence when it is his duty to speak, intentionally or through culpable negligence induces another to believe that certain facts exist, and the other person rightfully relies and acts on such belief, and will be prejudiced if the former is permitted to deny the existence of such facts.

Equitable estoppel is defined as the effect of the voluntary conduct of a party whereby he is absolutely precluded, both at law and in equity, from asserting rights which might perhaps have otherwise existed, either of property, of contract, or of remedy, as against another person who in good faith relied on such conduct, and has been led thereby to change his position for the worse, and who on his part acquires some corresponding right either of contract or of remedy; and the same definition is given estoppel in pais and estoppel by misrepresentation,[74] these terms, as shown infra in sub-

Truth between parties

What one induces another to regard as true is to be treated as the truth between them if the party who acts has been misled to his damage by the conduct or statements of the other.

made or a position assumed where otherwise inequitable consequences would result to another who, having a right to do so under the circumstances has, in good faith, relied thereon.[80] When a party unjustly contrives to put another in a dilemma and to subject him to necessity and distress and he acts one way, it is not for the wrongdoer to insist that he should have acted another way.[81]

Whether or not the doctrine of equitable estoppel is applicable depends on the particular facts and circumstances of each case.[82]

A statute providing that whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing to be true, and to act on such belief, he cannot, in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, be permitted to falsify it is but a crystallization into statutory form of rules otherwise existing.[83]

As affecting land titles, equitable estoppel is a doctrine by which a party is prevented from setting up his legal title because he has through his acts, words, or silence led another to take a position in which the assertion of the legal title would be contrary to equity and good conscience.[84]

b. Estoppel by Conduct

Estoppel by conduct is the estoppel to deny that a particular state of facts exists which arises from the conduct of a person which induces another to believe in the existence of such state of facts and to act thereon to his prejudice.

Estoppel by conduct is such conduct by the one sought to be estopped as thereafter precludes him from asserting a cause of action or relying on a defense, although such cause of action, or defense may be based on truth, against one who has changed his position for the worse in reliance on such conduct.[85] It arises where a person, against whom it is pleaded, by his conduct induces another person relying on such conduct to believe in the existence of a particular state of facts and to act thereon to his prejudice,[86] it being a well recognized rule that if a person by his conduct induces another to believe in the existence of a particular state of facts, and the other acts thereon to his prejudice, the former is estopped, as against the latter, to deny that that state of facts does in truth exist.[87] Other statements, sometimes made, are that estoppel by conduct exists or arises: Where a party has been induced by the conduct of another to do, or forbear doing, something he would not have, or would have, done but for such conduct;[88] where the conduct of a party has resulted in disadvantage to the opposite party or advantage to himself;[89] or from an act or declaration of a person intended or calculated to mislead another on which such other person has relied, and has so acted, or refrained from acting, that injury will befall him if the truth of the act or declaration be denied.[90] In so far as conduct amounts to, and is considered as, a representation, it is dealt with in this chapter together with other matters constituting representations; but in so far as conduct inconsistent with a right subsequently asserted is viewed as a form of quasi estoppel, it is dealt with in the chapter on quasi estoppel, the general rule pertaining thereto being stated in § 108, and particular matters being discussed in subsequent sections, such as acquiescence in §§ 113–115, and acceptance of benefits in §§ 109–112.

c. Comparison of Terms and Principles

Although other terms and principles have been distinguished from equitable estoppel or estoppel in pais, equitable estoppel and estoppel in pais are frequently, and equitable estoppel and estoppel by representation are occasionally, used interchangeably without recognition of any difference between them.

By the earlier usage matter in pais commonly meant matter of fact as distinguished from matter of record.[91] In the law of estoppel, however, it meant, and still means, matter of fact as distinguished from matter of record or conventional writing.[92] Estoppel in pais, therefore, includes all forms of estoppel not arising from a record, from a deed, or from a written contract.[93]

Equitable estoppel is so denominated because the term was borrowed originally from equity,[94] and because it arises on facts which render its application in the protection of rights equitable and just,[95] but not because its recognition is peculiar to equitable tribunals.[96] Like an estoppel generally, see supra § 1, it is called estoppel because a man's own act or acceptance prevents him from alleging or proving the truth.[97] Equitable estoppel signifies estoppel by misrepresentation;[98] and the two terms are sometimes used interchangeably.[99] So also, equitable estoppel is estoppel in pais,[1] and estoppel in pais is equitable estoppel;[2] in modern usage the two terms are convertible[3] and, as judicially noted,[4] are often commingled and used interchangeably without statement or recognition of any difference between them.[5] Indeed, the two terms are sometimes combined into one, such as equitable estoppel in pais.[6] Although some cases recognize a distinction between an estoppel in pais and an equitable estoppel when the latter term is employed to designate a quasi estoppel, that is, one in which there is a situation which is analogous to, and has the same effect as, an estoppel in pais, but to which not all of the rules governing an estoppel in pais are applicable,[7] other cases do not do so and instead assert that both equitable estoppel and estoppel in pais embrace quasi estoppel[8] and estoppel by conduct.[9] Promissory estoppel, which is considered below in § 80, differs from equitable estoppel in that it rests on a promise to do something in the future, while the latter rests on a statement of present fact.[10]

Abandonment. The distinction between abandonment and estoppel in pais is stated in Abandonment § 2 b (8).

Acquiescence. Although acquiesence may constitute the basis of an equitable estoppel, or at least a quasi estoppel, as to which see infra § 114, and although acquiesence and estoppel belong to the same family in the law,[11] they are not strictly synonymous.[12] An estoppel goes deeper than the principle of acquiesence.[13]

Fraud. Fraud and estoppel in pais have some elements which are similar and they are alike in that each is dependent on a representation, but they differ in the following respects: In fraud the representation is the foundation of the cause of action or defense, while in estoppel the representation is the means by which there has been made known the position of a party with regard to a material fact, from which position he would like to retreat and to which the representee desires to hold him; in fraud the representee endeavors to establish a discrepancy between the representation and the truth, while in estoppel he endeavors to show that it would be inequitable to permit the truth to be known; estoppel stops short of embracing all the elements of fraud; and a cause of action exists where all the elements of fraud are present, but not necessarily where all the elements of estoppel are present.[14]

As stated infra § 69 a, fraud is an element of estoppel only in the sense that a fraudulent result would follow a denial of the truth of the representation, and not in the sense that the representation must have been made with an intent to deceive.

Laches. The distinction between laches and estoppel is stated in Equity § 112.

Presumption of ouster. The doctrine of equitable estoppel is entirely distinct from the presumption of ouster created by continuous possession for twenty years.[15]

Principle that person may not rely on his own wrong. Although it is sometimes denominated an estoppel or equitable estoppel,[16] the principle that equity will not permit one to rely on his own wrongful act, as against those affected by it but who have not participated in it, to support his own asserted legal title or to defeat a remedy which, except for his misconduct, would not be available, is not an estoppel in a strict and technical sense.[17]

§ 60. Distinguished from Ratification and Adoption

The reason for holding a person bound by ratification differs from the reason for holding him bound by estoppel; but the distinction between the terms is sometimes ignored or is regarded as only of abstract, and not concrete, significance in the case at hand.

The distinction between a contract intentionally assented to, or ratified in fact, and an estoppel to deny the validity of the contract, is very wide. In the former case the party is bound because he intended to be; in the latter, he is bound notwithstanding there was no such intention, because the other party will be prejudiced and defrauded by his conduct unless the law treats him as legally bound.[18] However, notwithstanding their capability of being distinguished, ratification and estoppel are closely allied;[19] the legal effect thereof is the same;[20] the abstract difference between them may not render it improper to consolidate them, or to include one in the other, in the concrete consideration of the facts of a particular case;[21] and the terms "ratification" and "estoppel in pais" are sometimes used in a way which seems to ignore any distinction between them.[22] The distinction between estoppel in pais and ratification in the law of agency is stated and discussed in Agency § 34 b.

§ 61. Distinguished from Waiver

a. What constitutes waiver
b. Differentiating features

a. What Constitutes Waiver

A waiver is commonly defined as the intentional relinquishment of a known right; and it is comprehensively defined as a voluntary and intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known existing legal right, advantage, benefit, claim, or privilege, which except for such waiver the party would have enjoyed.

A waiver is comprehensively defined as a voluntary and intentional relinquishment or abandonment of a known existing legal right, advantage, benefit, claim, or privilege, which except for such waiver the party would have enjoyed.[23] However, there are various other definitions of the term,[24] including those which are similar to, but are not as full and comprehensive as, the one just stated.[25] One

Relinquishment with knowledge
Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts.

once made it cannot be recalled, expunged, or revoked,[31] nor can the right waived be reclaimed[32] or regained by revoking the waiver.[33] The word "waiver" carries certain implications, such as the relinquishment of a legal position[34] and, as shown infra § 72 a, an election to forego or dispense with some right or advantage; but the definitions of waiver are not to be understood as implying that any voluntary or intentional relinquishment of a known right is necessarily effective.[35] Although the word is flexible and not always definite,[36] it is capable of taking on a very definite meaning from its context.[37] The doctrine of waiver is often difficult of application;[38] and the question of whether waiver is present in any particular case must be decided on the facts peculiar to that case.[39]

b. Differentiating Features

The ground of distinction between the doctrines of waiver and estoppel most frequently adverted to is that waiver rests on intention of the party while estoppel rests on a detrimental change of position induced by his acts or conduct. The distinction is close in cases of implied waiver and the terms are frequently used as interchangeable.

Waiver and estoppel or estoppel in pais are closely related;[40] the line of demarcation between them is said to be very slight, since both partake of somewhat the same elements and ask essentially the same relief;[41] and the terms are frequently and loosely used as convertible,[42] especially where waivers implied, and estoppels arising, from conduct are involved, the dividing line being very shadowy in such cases[43] and it being often a difficult question to determine just where the doctrine of implied waiver ends and that of estoppel begins.[44] Where the waiver relied on is constructive, or merely implied from the conduct of a party, irrespective of what his actual intention may have been, it is at least questionable if there are not present some of the elements of estoppel.[45] It has been declared on the one hand, that estoppel is a species of waiver[46] and, on the other hand, that waiver belongs to the family,[47] and, according to the judicial decisions on the subject, is in the nature,[48] of estoppel. Also it has been held or stated that estoppel is the basis[49] and an indispensable element[50] of waiver, it being the essence of waiver and there being no waiver where there is no estoppel.[51] Estoppel as an alternative element of waiver is considered below in connection with the necessity of intent, see infra § 69 b, and consideration, see infra § 67 c.

Inconsistency with claim of right

At any rate, the same conduct may constitute both an implied waiver and an estoppel.[52] A waiver may be based on, or arise from, an estoppel;[53] it may have the elements of an equitable estoppel;[54] and, provided the elements of estoppel, as well as of waiver, are present,[55] a waiver, when established, may amount to, or operate as, an estoppel, or, in other words there may be an estoppel by waiver,[56] it being well settled that, where a party to a transaction induces another to act on the reasonable belief that he has waived or will waive certain rights, remedies, or objections which he is entitled to assert, he will be estopped to insist on such rights, remedies, or objections to the prejudice of the one misled.[57] The doctrine of estoppel by waiver, it has been said, applies in any case to determine the rights of the parties from the time when a mistake of law or of fact becomes known to the parties whose rights are affected.[58]

However, strictly and accurately speaking, waiver and estoppel or estoppel in pais are distinguishable, rather than synonymous or convertible, terms;[59] the same set of facts may establish one, but not the other;[60] waiver is not in the proper sense of the term a species of estoppel[61] and does not necessarily amount to an estoppel;[62] the doctrine of waiver does not necessarily depend on estoppel[63] or misrepresentation;[64] a waiver may be created by acts, conduct, or declarations insufficient to create a technical estoppel;[65] it may be established without proving all[66] the elements of an estoppel;[67] and it has been said that waiver does not require any element of estoppel at all.[68] There are several essential differences between the two doctrines.[69] According to all the accepted definitions of the term "waiver," it is of the essence of the waiver that there should be an intentional relinquishment of a known right,[70] and necessarily therefore it assumes the existence of an opportunity for choice between the relinquishment and the enforcement of the right,[71] while in estoppel the intention to relinquish a right is not necessarily present.[72] Also waiver depends on what one himself intends to do, while estoppel depends rather on what the adversary party is induced to do;[73] and waiver involves the acts and conduct of only one of the parties, regardless of the attitude assumed by the other party, whereas estoppel, on the other hand, involves the conduct of both parties.[74] A waiver does not necessarily imply that one has been misled to his prejudice or into an altered position; an estoppel always involves this element.[75] Estoppel results from an act which may operate to the injury of the other party; waiver may affect the opposite party beneficially.[76] Also estoppel may carry the implication of fraud; waiver does not.[77] Furthermore, estoppel may arise as between consistent remedies; for waiver by election to operate as a bar, the remedies must be inconsistent.[78] Estoppel and waiver have been distinguished on the ground that a consideration is necessary for the former, but not the latter.[79] However the basis for this distinction does not find support in the weight of authority. As shown infra § 67 c, it is generally considered that an estoppel need not be supported by a consideration and the view is taken by a number of authorities that a waiver must be so supported in some situations, as where there is no estoppel.

In insurance cases. The distinction between waiver and estoppel is frequently noted in insurance cases and, in so far as it bears on insurance law, is discussed at length in the C.J.S. title Insurance § 673, also 26 C.J. p 279 note 28–p 281 note 46, and 32 C.J. p 1315 note 60–p 1316 note 67.

§ 62. Distinguished from Legal Estoppel

Legal and equitable estoppels differ in basis and object.

There is quite a distinction between the two classes of estoppel, legal and equitable.[80] Legal estoppel, which is founded on deeds and judicial records,[81] excludes evidence of the truth and the equity of the particular case to support a strict rule of law on grounds of public policy.[82] Equitable estoppel, which is in pais, see supra § 59 c, is admitted on exactly the opposite ground of promoting the equity and justice of the individual case by preventing a party from asserting his rights under a general technical rule of law, when he has so conducted himself that it would be contrary to equity and good conscience for him to allege and prove the truth.[83]

An estoppel by misrepresentation differs from estoppel by record, by deed, and by contract, in that it is not based on an agreement of the parties or on a finding of fact which may not be disputed.[84] Another ground of distinction is said to be that it is not mutual, but applies to only one party.[85] According to the weight of authority, however, an estoppel in pais must be mutual, as stated infra § 76.

§ 63. Object and Purpose of Doctrine

The doctrine of estoppel in pais is based on grounds of public policy and good faith, it being intended to af-

Application of golden rule
The doctrine of equitable estoppel is based on an application of the golden rule to the everyday affairs of men. It requires that one should do unto others as, in equity and good conscience, he would have them do unto him, if their positions were reversed.—McNeely v. Walters, 189 S.E. 114, 211 N.C. 112.

Departure from common law rule
It having been found that the common-law rule recognizing only legal estoppels was too narrow and inadequate for the attainment of justice under the multiplied transactions of modern times, the equitable estoppel of the present day was recognized and applied.—Carruthers v. ford protection against injustice and fraud by denying to a person the right to repudiate his acts, admissions, or representations which have been relied on by the person to whom they were directed and whose conduct they were intended to, and did, influence. It is more than a rule of evidence, but nevertheless is merely a protective weapon and should never be given inequitable application.

The doctrine of estoppel in pais, although it has been characterized as odious,[86] a harsh doctrine,[87] and not to be favored,[88] on the ground that it tends to exclude the truth,[89] is not so regarded in some cases,[90] it being said that it does not so much shut out the truth as let in the truth, and the whole truth.[91] Estoppel is sometimes regarded as being a branch of the law of evidence[92] and governed by the laws of the forum.[93] The doctrine is, however, much more than a rule of evidence;[94] it is said to establish rights[95] and to determine remedies;[96] but, nevertheless, its operation and effect, which are fully discussed in §§ 148–152, are limited; and in a number of cases its purpose is declared to be the preservation of rights already acquired and not the creation of new ones.[97] It is based on the grounds of public policy and good faith,[98] and is interposed to prevent injury, fraud, injustice, and inequitable consequences by denying to a person the right to repudiate his acts, admissions, or representations, when they have been relied on by persons to whom they were directed and whose conduct they were intended to and did influence.[99]

The doctrine of estoppel is far reaching in its effect, extending to real as well as personal estate, and embracing almost every enterprise in which men may be engaged.[1] Nevertheless, it is not of unlimited application.[2] As the doctrine, when applied, contravenes the technical, legal rights of the person estopped,[3] stays the operation of the usual machinery employed to adjust the rights of men, and halts proceedings to make certain of justice,[4] and hence is somewhat of a superlaw,[5] arbitrary[6] and penal[7] in nature and character, it should be applied with great care and caution in each case;[8] otherwise there would be great danger that estoppels of this character would justly be regarded as "odious."[9] It is applied in, and only in, exceptional cases[10] wherein there is manifest inequity,[11] and

Loss or injury from disappointment of expectations

The vital principle of equitable estoppel is that a person who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done may not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations on which he acted.

Both sexes

Estoppel in pais operates alike, whether against conduct of woman or of man.—Bragg v. Hatfield, 130 A. 233, 124 Me. 391.

All transactions

Equitable estoppel imposes its obligation on all transactions.—Robinson v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, C.C.A., 100 F.2d 847, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 81, 308 U.S. 567, 84 L.Ed. 476.

Legislative or administrative proceedings

Doctrine of estoppel has application in adversary judicative controversies at law or in equity where one party is prevented from making a claim by reason of his previous conduct to damage of his opponent, but doctrine is not ordinarily applicable in unilateral legislative or administrative proceedings.—Furstenberg v. Application in criminal cases

(1) The doctrine of estoppel may be applied in a criminal case to the extent of holding that accused is estopped to assert a certain fact.—People v. Blackmore, 261 P. 1053, 87 Cal.App. 222.

(2) Also, the government may be estopped from prosecuting under circumstances ordinarily considered under the heading of entrapment, see Criminal Law § 45 a.

(3) However, as stated in Criminal Law § 42, equitable estoppel of the person injured by an offense is not a defense in a criminal prosecution.

Punishment

In some cases it has been stated that estoppel is never employed to inflict punishment for a wrongful or unlawful act, but in those cases some element of estoppel was lacking. In other words, estoppel does not arise from a wrongful act alone, even though such act is made a crime by statute.

and enforcement of fair dealing, and the prevention of results contrary to good conscience and fair dealing, are involved in equitable estoppel and the application thereof.[23] The doctrine can be invoked only to promote fair dealing.[24]

Undue advantage. One of the purposes of estoppel is to prevent one person, by throwing another off his guard, from obtaining an unfair advantage or from acting inconsistently to another's disadvantage.[25] It may not be properly invoked to permit the party asserting it to secure an undue advantage.[26]

§ 64. Availability at Law

With some exceptions, an estoppel in pais is cognizable in an action at law and it is not necessary, or even proper, to resort to equity for the sole purpose of presenting it.

While an estoppel in pais is equitable in nature,[27] the doctrine pertaining thereto having originated in equity[28] and being governed by equitable principles,[29] it nevertheless, as a general rule, may be set up in actions at law, as well as in suits in equity,[30] and it is not necessary to proceed by a suit in equity in order to obtain the benefit thereof.[31] Consequently, in order to justify a resort to a court of equity, it is necessary to show some ground of equity other than the estoppel itself, whereby the party entitled to the benefit of it is prevented from making it available in a court of law.[32]

Exceptions to rule. It does not follow, because equitable estoppels may originate legal as distinguished from equitable rights, that it may not be necessary in particular cases to resort to a court of equity in order to make them available;[33] and equitable estoppel is not cognizable in an action at law on the bond of an administrator;[34] and, while there is some authority to the contrary,[35] it is generally held that, where the estoppel sought to be set up involves the title to land, or an interest therein which can only be transferred by deed, it cannot be taken advantage of in an action at law, but only by resort to a court of equity,[36] and that a judgment which assumes to affect the legal title to a freehold in a common-law proceeding is erroneous.[37] Whether an equitable estoppel is a defense in an action of ejectment is considered in Ejectment § 45. It has been held that the only estoppels which are available in equity and not in law are such as depend on titles and relations which are not cognizable at law.[38]

§ 65. Estoppel against Estoppel

A party may be precluded by counter estoppel from asserting an estoppel; and where he is so precluded, the matter in issue is to be determined and disposed of otherwise than by application of the doctrine of estoppel.

A party may assert a counter estoppel against an estoppel offered by the adverse party.[39] Where an estoppel exists against an estoppel, the matter is set at large,[40] or is left as if neither estoppel had

Adaptation to legal proceedings

The doctrine of estoppel in pais was taken over at quite an early day by courts of law and made adaptable to, and applied in, legal proceedings to prevent circuity of action, or to obviate the necessity of bringing another proceeding to enforce rights growing out of the same transaction, and to award relief by specific reparation, where specific reparation could equitably be had, and, where it could not, to award restitution in money equivalent to the damages sustained and all for the promotion of justice and equity.

Part of common law

The doctrine of estoppel was administered by the courts at common law; it is part of the common law in force in a state; and its proper application is not violative of, but is consistent with, the constitution and statutes of the state.—Steen v. Scott, Fla., 198 So. 489—New York Life Ins. Co. v. Oates, 192 So. 637, 141 Fla. 164—New York Life Ins. Co. v. Oates, 166 So. 269, 122 Fla. 540—State v. been offered;[41] the two estoppels destroy each other[42] and the interest of justice requires that both parties be liberated therefrom.[43] Somewhat related propositions concerning the mutuality of an estoppel are considered infra § 76. Also, the question of whether a party who is himself guilty of bad faith may claim an estoppel is treated below in § 75.

§ 66. Laches or Delay in Asserting Estoppel

A claim of estoppel may be affected by laches or negligence, but not by mere delay, in asserting it.

An equitable estoppel is not lost by delay in asserting it as would be the corresponding action for deceit growing out of the transaction;[44] but, in order to justify a person setting up an estoppel against the legal owner of land, he must be free from the imputation of laches in acting on the belief of ownership by one who has no right.[45] The negligence of the holder of an equity arising out of an estoppel by misrepresentation may change the order of priority and postpone his equity to that of a junior holder of an equity in the same property.[46]

b. Existence and nature of right
c. Contract or consideration

a. Enumeration of Elements

(1) Of equitable estoppel
(2) Of waiver

(1) Of Equitable Estoppel

To create an equitable estoppel, a false representation or concealment of material facts must be made, by a person with knowledge, actual or constructive, of the real facts, to a person without such knowledge, with the intention that it shall be acted on by the latter person, and he must so rely and act thereon that he will suffer injury or prejudice by the repudiation or contradiction thereof or the assertion of a claim inconsistent therewith.

In order to constitute an equitable estoppel or estoppel in pais there must exist a false representation or concealment of material facts; it must have been made with knowledge, actual or constructive, of the facts; the party to whom it was made must have been without knowledge or the means of knowledge of the real facts; it must have been made with the intention that it should be acted on; and the party to whom it was made must have relied on or acted on it to his prejudice.[47] Various

Estoppel by conduct

(1) Estoppel by conduct cannot be effected unless there is misrepresentation of facts or willful concealment thereof, made with knowledge of the facts to one ignorant of them, with intent of having the other party act thereon, and such other party must be induced thereby to act.

(2) A similar statement has been made with the additional requirement that the party must have been induced to act differently than he otherwise would.—Hartlep v. Murphy, 150 N.E. 312, 197 Ind. 222.

(3) Generally, to constitute an estoppel by conduct, there must be false representation or wrongful, misleading silence, the error must originate in a statement of fact and not in an opinion or statement of law, the person claiming benefit of estoppel must be ignorant of true facts, and such person must be adversely affected by the acts of the person against whom estoppel is claimed.—Uhlmann Grain Co. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co. of Maryland, C.C.A.Ill., 116 F.2d 105.

Equitable estoppel to assert title

(1) Requisites of equitable estoppel to assert title are claimant's knowledge of title, other party's ignorance thereof, and latter's deception in reliance on former's representations or silence.—American Exchange Nat. Bank v. Winder, 150 S. E. 489, 198 N.C. 18.

(2) In order to be equitably estopped to assert title, party must have made admissions or declarations or done acts with intention of deceiving or with such carelessness or culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud, with knowledge of true state of his own title, and other party must have had no knowledge of title or convenient means of acquiring such knowledge.—Gioscio v. Lautenschlager, 73 P.2d 1230, 23 Cal.App.2d 616.

particular element in greater detail, while others are more compact or, without denying the necessity thereof, fail to mention some particular element, all are to the same effect as the foregoing enumeration. One frequently repeated statement is that to constitute "estoppel in pais" there must concur an admission, statement, or act inconsistent with the claim afterward asserted, action by the other party on the faith of such admission, statement, or act, and injury to such other party resulting from allowing the first party to contradict or repudiate such admission, statement, or act.[49] There can be no estoppel if any of the requisite elements thereof are wanting.[50] They are each of equal importance.[51]

crystallized into statutory form, the pertinent statutes have been construed to require all of the necessary elements of estoppel at common law.[52]

An equitable estoppel or estoppel in pais presupposes, is based on, and does not arise without, fault on the part of the person against whom it is asserted;[53] the doctrine is inapplicable where both parties to the transaction are in the right.[54] Also, estoppel presupposes two adverse parties[55] and a situation where one has changed his position in reliance on representations or conduct of the other and will be injured by the other's repudiation of his representations or conduct.[56] Furthermore, the doctrine of estoppel by conduct rests on the assumption that the person to be estopped is capable of binding himself by admissions or conduct;[57] a party cannot be estopped in pais when he is unable to bind himself by contract[58] or where the circumstances are such that a contract, if made, would not be sustained.[59]

(2) Of Waiver

The essential elements of a waiver are an existing right, benefit, or advantage; knowledge, actual or constructive, of the existence of such right, benefit, or advantage; and an actual intention to relinquish it or an adequate substitute for such intention.

To constitute a waiver, there must be an existing right, benefit, or advantage, knowledge, actual or constructive, of the existence of such right, benefit, or advantage, and an actual intention to relinquish it,[60] or such conduct as warrants an inference of relinquishment.[61] There must be an existing right and an intention to relinquish it;[62] and there must be both knowledge of the existence of a right and an intention to relinquish it.[63] A waiver exists only where one, with full knowledge of material facts, does or forbears to do something inconsistent with the existence of the right in ques-

To work estoppel

(1) In order that a waiver may work or operate as an estoppel, it must appear that the party against whom the doctrines of waiver and estoppel are invoked knew his rights and intentionally relinquished or surrendered them.—Empire Buggy Co. v. Moss, 151 S.E. 788, 154 S.C. 424.

(2) In addition to the elements of knowledge and intention, the party against whom the estoppel is sought must by his conduct have caused the

tion or of his intention to rely on that right.[64] It cannot be made to depend on terminology alone.[65]

Parties. A waiver requires two parties, one waiving a right and another receiving the benefit of the waiver.[66]

Assent or consent. Waiver is said to be a matter of consent,[67] or to involve the idea of assent,[68] or to require assent[69] or consent.[70]

b. Existence and Nature of Right

Both waiver and estoppel imply that the subject matter thereof is some legal right possessed at the time thereof by the person against whom it is asserted. Only a private right or privilege may be waived.

The doctrine of estoppel implies the existence of some legal right which the party against whom it is asserted would, but for his conduct, fraud, or acquiescence, have been entitled to enforce.[71] So, also, a waiver implies and requires the existence of the right in question at the time of the alleged waiver;[72] there can be no waiver of a right before it exists[73] or after it has been lost.[74]

Provided the waiver will not infringe on the rights of others,[75] nor be against public policy,[76] and the right or privilege waived is exclusively private and is intended for the benefit of the person waiving it,[77] a person may waive any right or privilege to which he is legally entitled,[78] whether such right or privilege is conferred, secured, or

c. Contract or Consideration

Neither a contract nor a consideration is necessary to support an estoppel; but the authorities do not agree as to the necessity of an agreement founded on a valuable consideration to support a waiver, although many consider such agreement and consideration necessary in the absence of acts or conduct constituting an estoppel.

While there may be a consideration in a case where there is an estoppel,[82] equitable estoppel is not grounded in principles of contract,[83] and it is not essential that it should rest on a consideration or agreement or legal obligation.[84] Also, according to some authorities, a waiver is not a contract[85] and need not be supported by a consideration,[86] or at least it need not be so supported in some cases,[87] as where the conduct of a party estops him from insisting on the right in question.[88] Indeed, some authorities lay down the rule that neither estoppel nor a new consideration is necessary to support a waiver.[89] Other authorities, however, hold or state that a waiver is contractual in nature[90] and requires a consideration,[91] or that, in the absence of acts or conduct constituting an estoppel, it must be supported by an agreement founded on a valuable consideration.[92] At any rate, a waiver may be supported by a consideration,[93] and it may arise by agreement.[94]

§ 68. Materiality of Representation

The false representation must be of a material fact.

It is essential to an equitable estoppel that the false representation, howsoever it may rise, whether by declarations, acts, or conduct, shall be of a material fact.[95]

§ 69. Intent

a. As element of equitable estoppel
b. As element of waiver

a. As Element of Equitable Estoppel

It is essential to equitable estoppel that the matters claimed to create it were intended to lead the other party to act thereon or that there were reasonable grounds to anticipate that he would so act; but an actual intent to deceive or defraud is not essential, provided the conduct and circumstances are such that it would be fraudulent or unconscionable for a party to deny what he has induced another to believe and act on.

Although it has been stated generally that intent is an essential element of estoppel,[96] and it has also been declared that the doctrine of estoppel imposes a result regardless of intent and sometimes in defiance of it,[97] the generally prevailing rule is that it is an essential element of an equitable estoppel that the acts, representations, or silence relied on to create the estoppel must have been willfully intended to lead the party setting up the estoppel to act on them,[98] or there must have been reasonable grounds to anticipate that he would change his position or in some way act on the faith of the conduct to his detriment.[99] The word "willfully" as used in this connection is not, however, to be taken in the limited sense of the term "maliciously" or "fraudulently";[1] it is sufficient if the acts, representations, or silence relied on are of such a character as to induce a reasonable and prudent man to believe that they were meant to be acted on;[2] and it is also sufficient that the conduct of a party occurred under such circumstances that he should have known that it was both natural and probable that it would be acted on.[3] As shown infra § 102, negligence may supply the place of intent and operate as an estoppel. On the other hand, ordinary, casual declarations or admissions, not made for the purpose of inducing any specific action, and on the faith of which no one has been misled, are not conclusive in their character and are entitled to have only such weight attached to them as under all the circumstances they may fairly deserve;[4] and in the absence of expressly proved fraud, there can be no estoppel based on the acts or conduct of the party sought to be estopped, where they are as consistent with honest purpose and with absence of negligence as with their opposites.[5]

Estoppel cannot be based on statements to third parties which were not intended to be communicated to the party claiming the benefit thereof.[6] Also, estoppel arises from words or acts, and not from intention alone, and the fact that defendant, acts or declarations, although not made with intent to mislead, were calculated to, and did, mislead.[16] However, either actual fraudulent intent or conduct of the character under consideration is essential to create an estoppel,[17] and it has been said that fraud or bad faith is a necessary ingredient of misrepresentation by passivity,[18] although there is authority apparently to the contrary.[19]

b. As Element of Waiver

An intention to relinquish a right is an essential element of waiver, or at least it is so in the absence of conduct estopping a party to deny that he consented to or intended a waiver. This intention may be expressed directly or implied from acts or declarations; but it must be manifested and not kept secret.

Intent is one of the primary, essential elements of waiver.[20] Its importance in the law of waiver is indicated by judicial statements that waiver is a matter or question of intention, or is largely, mainly, or essentially so, as well as by various other statements demonstrating the dependence of waiver on the intention of the party sought to be charged therewith.[21] The requisite intention is one to waive, abandon, relinquish, forego, or surrender a right[22] which, as shown supra § 67 b must exist, and, as stated infra § 70, must be known; and, as noted supra § 61, this intention, which is not necessarily present in estoppel, is one of the grounds of distinction between waiver and estoppel. This intention must be clear;[23] and while it may either be expressed directly or be implied or inferred from conduct or declarations,[24] a mere secret understanding or intention is not sufficient;[25] the intention must be indicated or manifested by some language, act, conduct, or omission related to the matter involved.[26]

It has been said that there can be no waiver without an intention to waive.[27] However, there is authority for the proposition that, notwithstanding the absence of an intention to waive, waiver may result or be presumed from conduct which prejudicially misleads the other party to believe that a waiver is intended.[28] Conversely, it is said that there can be no waiver unless it was so intended by one party and understood by the other or one party has so acted as to mislead the other and is estopped thereby;[29] and it has also been said that a waiver will not be presumed or implied contrary to the intention of a party whose rights would be injuriously affected thereby unless, by such party's conduct, the opposite party has been misled to his prejudice into an honest belief that a waiver was consented to or intended.[30]

§ 70. Knowledge of Facts

a. As element of equitable estoppel
b. As element of waiver

a. As Element of Equitable Estoppel

Unless knowledge is necessarily imputable to the person claimed to be estopped or he was culpably negligent in not knowing the facts, actual, full knowledge, on his part, of the real facts, at the time of his representation, concealment, or other conduct relating thereto and alleged to constitute the basis of the estoppel, is an indispensable element of an equitable estoppel.

It is generally indispensable to the application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel that the person claimed to be estopped shall have had full knowledge of the real facts at the time of his representation, concealment, or other conduct relating thereto and alleged to constitute the basis of the estoppel.[31] Equitable estoppel cannot be successful-

Extent of knowledge

(1) Where the material facts are false representations, a person has sufficient knowledge of those facts to supply this element of estoppel where he has knowledge of the falsity of the representations, even though he does not know the exact extent of the falsity or have possession of all the proof thereof.—Caprito v. Grisham-Hunter Corporation, Tex.Civ.App., 128 S.W.2d 149, error dismissed, judgment correct.

(2) In order that a person may be estopped by his declarations in response to an inquiry, he must have knowledge of the purpose of the inquiry and of the interest of the person claiming the estoppel.—Hydro-Centrifugals v. Crawford Laundry Co., 147 A. 31, 110 Conn. 49.

acts and declarations of a party based on ignorance of, or an innocent mistake as to, his legal rights will not estop him to assert the same,[41] especially where the parties stand on equal terms in respect of actual or imputed knowledge of the facts.[42]

Knowledge or lack of knowledge on the part of the person asserting the estoppel is considered in connection with the necessity of his reliance on the representations, see infra § 71.

Actual knowledge or substitute therefor. Ordinarily, actual or imputed knowledge of the material facts by the person claimed to be estopped, at the time of his acts, declarations, or conduct relied on as giving rise to the estoppel, is essential to an equitable estoppel.[43] It is sometimes said that actual knowledge of the facts is necessary;[44] but generally it is not considered indispensable that the knowledge should be actual if the circumstances are such that a knowledge of the truth is necessarily imputed to the party sought to be estopped,[45] or if he has actively and recklessly interfered to the prejudice of another;[46] and it is recognized that culpable[47] or inexcusable[48] negligence in not knowing the facts may be the equivalent of actual knowledge for the purpose of an estoppel.

Avoidance of rule by contract. Parties may contract with reference to the rule of law relating to knowledge, so as to prevent lack of knowledge of a fact from avoiding an estoppel.[49]

b. As Element of Waiver

Full knowledge of the right waived and the facts on which the waiver is based is an essential element of waiver.

Knowledge is an essential element of waiver; there can be no waiver without it,[50] unless the parties contract with respect to the rule, as they may, so as to prevent lack of knowledge of a fact from avoiding a waiver,[51] or unless the party who is alleged to have waived a right has, by his representations or conduct, misled the other party and caused him to act, or to omit to act, to his injury, and has thereby become estopped.[52] There must be knowledge of the right[53] or matter[54] waived and of all[55] material or essential[56] facts[57] on which the waiver is based.[58] Furthermore, there can be no waiver without full knowledge[59] of the right waived[60] and of all[61] material[62] facts.[63] A milder statement, sometimes made, is that there must be reasonable knowledge of all the facts and of the rights intended to be waived.[64] It has been asserted that actual knowledge is necessary;[65] but more frequently it is held or stated that actual or constructive knowledge is necessary and sufficient.[66]

§ 71. Reliance on Representation

a. In general
b. Knowledge or lack thereof by person claiming estoppel

a. In General

The doctrine of equitable estoppel is not applicable unless the person invoking it relied, and had a right to rely, on the representation or conduct of the person sought to be estopped.

Representations by agent

In ejectment, that plaintiff's predecessor's attorney, who examined title to property in controversy for defendant's predecessor, stated to defendant's predecessor that plaintiff's predecessor claimed none of property in controversy would not estop plaintiff from asserting title where defendant's predecessor must have known that it was not within the scope of the agency of the attorney to locate the land claimed by plaintiff's predecessor.—Fordson Coal Co. v. ed, he cannot claim that the conduct of the other party was the cause of his action and no estoppel will arise.[76]

Subsequent acts. Acts done subsequent to the transaction out of which the estoppel is claimed to arise can have no bearing on the question.[77] The representations or conduct relied on to raise the estoppel must have been concurrent with or anterior to the action which they are alleged to have influenced.[78] If, however, a party having an interest to prevent an act being done has full notice of its having been done, and acquiesces in it, so as to induce a reasonable belief that he consents to it, and the position of others is altered by their giving credit to his sincerity, he has no more right to challenge the act to their prejudice than he would have had if it had been done by his previous license;[79] and it has been held that, although a contract had been entered into before a representation was made, an estoppel arises if the performance of the contract was induced by such representation.[80]

b. Knowledge or Lack Thereof by Person Claiming Estoppel

There is no compliance with the rule requiring reliance on representations, express or implied, as an element of equitable estoppel where the person setting up the estoppel had no knowledge of the acts, conduct, or statements by which the representations were made or where he had actual knowledge, or ready or convenient means of acquiring knowledge, of the real facts concerning which the representations were made.

Obviously a party did not rely on,[81] and could not have been misled by,[82] acts, statements, or transactions which were unknown to him at the time. Also, where the real facts were known to a person or were open for his convenient ascertainment, he was not justified in relying on representations pertaining thereto[83] and he cannot effectively say that he was misled or deceived by such representations.[84] Hence, as a corollary to the proposition that the party setting up an estoppel must have acted in reliance on the conduct or representations of the party sought to be estopped, the former must have had knowledge of the conduct or representations[85] and must not only have been destitute of knowledge of the real facts as to the matter in controversy, but must have also been without convenient or ready means of acquiring such knowledge.[86] One relying on an estoppel must have exercised such reasonable diligence to acquire knowl-

Knowledge or notice

There can be no estoppel where party claiming estoppel had notice or knowledge of the facts.—Ingram v. Smith, 195 S.E. 882, 57 Ga.App. 438.

Knowledge of facts putting person on inquiry

(1) Estoppel by representation cannot be claimed by one acting thereon, if he knows, or is put on inquiry as to, falsity of representation.—W. E Richmond & Co. v. Security Nat. Bank, 64 S.W.2d 863, 16 Tenn. App. 414.

(2) Even in a state where a person is not held, as a matter of law, to have knowledge of all facts which a reasonable inquiry on his part would develop, yet where he has knowledge of facts that would put a reasonably prudent person on inquiry the jury may, from those facts alone, infer that he had knowledge of all facts which such an inquiry would have developed.—Stottlemyre v. Swearingen, Mo.App., 297 S.W. 1003.

Party knowing facts, or in position to know them, cannot claim benefit of estoppel.—Hull v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, C.C.A., 87 F.2d 260.

Knowledge or negligence

Estoppel cannot be invoked by one who knew the facts or was negligent in not knowing them.—Froslee v. Sonju, Minn., 297 N.W. 1.

Ignorance or lack of knowledge

(1) A party pleading or claiming an estoppel must have been ignorant, or without knowledge, of the true state of facts.

Knowledge implied from occupancy of land. A person in the actual occupancy of his land gives thereby all the information of his claim which is required, unless specially interrogated, and his mere failure to assert title under such circumstances cannot operate as an estoppel.[89]

Record of notice of title. A public record is an available means of information as to questions of title, and one who does not take advantage of it cannot claim an estoppel against one who merely fails to furnish such information.[90] It has been held that he will not be estopped by his silence, although he may know or be informed that others are negotiating for rights and interests in property bound by his title of record, as he is under no obligation to warn or apprise them of that which the record discloses,[91] but there is authority to the contrary.[92]

Active misrepresentation of facts. There are, however, cases in which the representation, by actively misleading the person setting up the estoppel and preventing him from having recourse to available means of information, has been held to excuse his failure to inform himself of the facts,[93] even in the case of constructive notice by matter of record.[94]

Duty to inform party against whom estoppel arises. No estoppel arises where the party setting it up is under as great obligation to inform the person sought to be estopped of the real facts as the latter is to inform himself.[95]

Equality of knowledge or notice with adverse party. In the absence of a fiduciary relationship between the parties,[96] there can be no equitable estoppel short of one arising from actual contract[97] where the truth is known to both parties or where they both have equal means of knowledge.[98] For obvious equitable reasons, the law of equitable es-

a. By person against whom waiver or estoppel is claimed

b. By person claiming estoppel

a. By Person against Whom Waiver or Estoppel Is Claimed

Equitable estoppel requires a false representation or concealment of facts by words, acts, conduct, or silence or omission to act when there is a duty to speak or act. Waiver may be express or implied; it may arise from words, oral or written, or it may be implied from acts or conduct or a course thereof. Acts or other matters giving rise to either waiver or estoppel must be voluntary.

A waiver is a voluntary act[1] implying an election to forego, or dispense with, some right or advantage;[2] but the voluntary character of an act re-

Opportunity to know law

(1) An estoppel cannot arise out of a lack of knowledge of the law, since all have an opportunity to know the law, and are presumed to know it.—Iterman v. Baker, 15 N.E. 2d 365, 214 Ind. 308.

(2) Ignorance of the fact that final interpretation of the constitution belongs to the judicial department of the government is no basis for a right to claim estoppel.—Trustees of Phillips Exeter Academy v. Exeter, 11 A.2d 569, 90 N.H. 472.

Lack of equal means or opportunity

(1) An estoppel can arise only where party claiming it has acted to his injury without full knowledge of the facts and without an equal opportunity to know the facts.—Iterman v. Baker, 15 N.E.2d 365, 214 Ind. 308.

(2) Constructive notice of facts does not prevent a person from rightfully relying on a misleading statement of facts where he does not have equal means with the other party of knowing the truth or untruth of the statement made by the latter, as where the party asserting the estoppel is a public administrative official and his administration of the laws would be greatly delayed and burdened if he and his agents were required to search court records diligently.—Robinson v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, C.C.A. 6, 100 F.2d 847, certiorari denied 60 S.Ct. 81, 308 U.S. 567, 84 L.Ed. 476.

lied on to show a waiver does not depend on the reasons prompting the act.[3] So it has been held that the doctrine of estoppel applies only to voluntary representations, admissions and acts, and not to declarations exacted by statute.[4]

Equitable estoppel arises from the conduct of a party, including his spoken words, his positive acts, and his silence or omission to act when there is a duty to speak or act.[5] There must be a false representation or concealment of facts;[6] there must be some word spoken, act done, or failure to speak or act when there is a duty to do so;[7] and, in cases where silence or omission is not claimed to create an estoppel or would not be sufficient for that purpose under the circumstances, there must be affirmative or overt[8] acts, conduct, or declarations.[9] In the broadest phase of equitable estoppel, the person estopped must have done something he should not have done or failed to do something he should have done;[10] but an estoppel cannot be founded on an illegal or invalid act.[11] Under the general headings of express misrepresentations, see infra §§ 78–86, implied representations, see infra §§ 87–101, negligence, see infra §§ 102–106, and equitable or quasi estoppel, see infra §§ 107–129, there is given below a detailed consideration of estoppels arising, or claimed to arise, from various acts, statements, omissions, and conduct inconsistent with a right subsequently asserted.

A waiver may be express or implied.[12] It may be created by acts, conduct or words, oral or written;[13] but, while it may be implied from acts or conduct, or a course thereof,[14] warranting an inference of relinquishment of a right,[15] a person does not waive his rights where he continues to demand them, or is led by promises of settlement or adjustment to continue his dealings with the other party, even though his acts are apparently inconsistent with the assertion of such rights.[16]

b. By Person Claiming Estoppel

One element of equitable estoppel is that the party asserting it shall have done or omitted some act or changed his position in reliance on the representations or conduct of the other party.

It is essential to an equitable estoppel that the person asserting the estoppel shall have done or omitted some act or changed his position in reliance upon the representations or conduct of the person sought to be estopped.[17] A change of position which will fulfill this element of estoppel must be actual,[18] substantial,[19] and justified.[20]

The bringing of suit, or the commencement of an action, is not a change of position within the meaning of the law of estoppel.[21] Also, in order that this element of an estoppel may be fulfilled by an

Sufficiency of nonaction

(1) It is not necessary that affirmative action be taken in reliance on representations made, but nonaction in reliance thereon resulting in injury is sufficient.—Hetchler v. American Life Ins. Co., 254 N.W. 221, 266 Mich. 608.

(2) It is sufficient if the party has been induced to refrain from using such means or taking such action as lay in his power by which he might have protected his rights or retrieved his position and saved himself from loss.

act, a party must do something which he would not do except for the conduct or representation of the other party.[22] The doctrine of estoppel has no application in cases where the representations or conduct which are claimed to give rise to it tend only to induce the party to do some act which he is already legally bound to do.[23]

§ 73. Benefit to Person against Whom Estoppel Asserted

A benefit to the person sought to be estopped is not essential to an estoppel where there is injury or detriment to the other party; but there is no estoppel where there is neither injury to one party nor advantage to the other.

It has been said in some decisions that the doctrine of estoppel does not obtain unless there is injury to one party or advantage to the other, resulting from the acts or declarations of the person to be estopped.[24] It is not necessary that a special benefit should be shown to have accrued to the party sought to be estopped;[25] it is sufficient to raise the estoppel if the other party has been induced to take upon himself burdens which he would not otherwise have taken;[26] and, a fortiori, a party is estopped whenever he has gained an undue advantage and has caused his adversary a loss or injury.[27] The creation of an estoppel by the acceptance of benefits is considered at length infra §§ 109–112. Whether a consideration is necessary to support a waiver or estoppel is treated supra § 67 c.

§ 74. Prejudice to Person Setting Up Estoppel

Injury, prejudice, or detriment to the party claiming it is essential to an estoppel, but not to a waiver, except where the waiver must necessarily rest on an estoppel.

In order to create an estoppel in pais the party pleading it must have been misled to his injury,[28]

Substantial prejudice
An essential element of estoppel is that party who seeks benefit thereof must have been led into such course of conduct that he will be substantially prejudiced if other party be permitted to repudiate former action or representation.—Smith v. National Commercial Title & Mortgage Guaranty Co., 198 A. 407, 120 N.J.Law 75.

Substantial prejudice or change of position
Estoppel in equity must rest on substantial grounds of prejudice or change of position, not on technicalities.—Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, Ala., 56 S.Ct. 466, 297 U.S. 288, 80 L.Ed. 688, affirming, C.C.A., Tennessee Valley Authority v. Ashwander, 78 F.2d 578, reversing, D.C., Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 9 F.Supp. 965, certiorari granted 56 S.Ct. 145 (two cases), 296 U.S. 562, 80 L.Ed. 396, rehearing denied 56 S.Ct. 588 (two cases), 297 U.S. 728, 80 L.Ed. 1011, mandate conformed to, D.C., 14 F.Supp. 11.

Material and injurious change of position
An indispensable element of an estoppel is a demonstration that a material and injurious change in position of person asserting the bar has resulted from act of one against whom estoppel is asserted.—In re Canfield's Will, 300 N.Y.S. 502, 165 Misc. 66.

Material disadvantage
Party invoking estoppel must show he will suffer some material disadvantage unless adversary is required to abide by election on which party has placed reliance.—Abercrombie v. United Light & Power Co., D.C.Md., 7 F.Supp. 530.

Serious disadvantage
It is essential to estoppel in pais that the conduct complained of must have induced another to act to his serious disadvantage.—Payne v. Payne, 217 N.W. 756, 241 Mich. 547.

Prejudice, substantial injury, or change of position for worse
Party relying on defense of estoppel must have been prejudiced or induced to change his position for the worse, or to suffer some substantial injury by reason of having been misled—Wisdom's Adm'r v. Sims, 144 S.W.2d 232, 284 Ky. 258.

sought to be estopped;[34] harm must result to him from acts done in reliance on the conduct or representations;[35] he must suffer loss, injury, or damage;[36] and where no available right is parted with and no injury suffered there can be no estoppel in pais.[37] A fortiori, an act clearly beneficial to the person setting up the estoppel cannot be relied on.[38] In the absence of injury, it is of course immaterial that the other elements of estoppel are present.[39]

Cause of loss or damage. Even though a party suffers loss or damage, there is no estoppel unless the loss or damage is legally caused by a wrong[40] or by his action or nonaction in rightful reliance on the truth of a representation.[41]

Payment of damages. It has been held that plaintiff is not estopped to claim damages where defendants have been awarded the damages sustained by them;[42] but it has also been held that a person once estopped will not be permitted thereafter to take a position inconsistent with his original attitude even if his adversary is paid for the detriment suffered by him.[43]

Harm from denial
To constitute an equitable estoppel, defendant must have done an act, or made an omission, which has induced complainant to change his position or condition, so that, if defendant is afterward permitted to deny truth of defendant's words or conduct, complainant must suffer harm.—Binns v. Csik, 15 A.2d 808, 128 N.J.Eq. 188.

(2) He must have been deprived of a right which he otherwise would have possessed or the estoppel must be necessary to protect a right already acquired and which he will lose unless the estoppel is declared.

dice to the party claiming it is not essential to a waiver;[44] but it may be necessary in a case of implied waiver,[45] and undoubtedly is necessary where the waiver must be based on an estoppel,[46] as where, in the situation dealt with in § 69 b, supra, there is no actual intent to waive and the waiver must be predicated on an estoppel to deny an intent to waive.

§ 75. Default or Wrongful Act of Person Setting Up Estoppel

A party may not properly base a claim of estoppel in his favor on his own wrongful act or dereliction of duty, on fraud committed or participated in by him, or on acts or omissions induced by his own conduct, concealment, or representations.

The doctrine of estoppel is for the protection of innocent persons,[47] and only the innocent may invoke it.[48] There is, in the very nature of the doctrine, some element of the maxim that one must come into a court of equity with clean hands.[49] It is essential that the party claiming the benefit of the estoppel should have proceeded in good faith.[50] A person may not predicate an estoppel in his favor on, or assert such estoppel for the purpose of making effective, obtaining the benefit of, or shielding himself from the results of, his own fraud,[51] violation of law,[52] wrongful act,[53] or other inequitable conduct in the transaction in question;[54] and the same is true of a fraudulent plan which he designed[55] and an attempt to defraud in which he was an active participant.[56] Neither may he base a claim of estoppel on conduct, omissions, or representations induced by his own conduct, concealment, or representations,[57] especially when fraudulent.[58] So one party to a scheme to defraud cannot base an estoppel on another's acts under the scheme.[59] Where the other party does not claim an estoppel, a litigant cannot become entitled to rely on his own fraud or wrong by asserting that he estopped himself thereby.[60] A party is not estopped

Act solicited by agent

Estoppel cannot be relied on to create liability where an agent acting solely for the benefit of his principal, actively participated in the deceit and fraud, and solicited the act from the person sought to be estopped by the principal.—First Nat. Bank v. Reed, 244 P. 368, 198 Cal. 252.

by a contract or instrument which he is induced by the fraud of the other party to execute,[61] nor is a party estopped to allege and prove fraud for the purpose of foreclosing any relief to either party to the fraud.[62]

There may be such a failure to perform a duty owing by the person claiming the estoppel to the person sought to be estopped as to preclude the former from relying on an estoppel.[63] Where there is no concealment, misrepresentation, or other inequitable conduct by the other party, a party may not properly claim that an estoppel arises in his favor from his own omission or mistake.[64] A person who is actuated by his own interest will not be heard to say that the other party should be estopped from acting on the same impulse.[65]

Of course, where the facts disclose no fraud by a particular party and do not bring the case within any of the foregoing rules, he is not, on account thereof, to be denied the right to plead an estoppel.[66]

§ 76. Mutuality

An estoppel in pais must be mutual in its binding effect.

An estoppel in pais to be binding must be mutual and reciprocal.[67] In other words, both parties must be bound or neither.[68] In some cases, however, it is said that estoppel by misrepresentation is not mutual, but applies to only one party,[69] and that an estoppel arising out of the misconduct of one party is in its very nature unilateral, that party being estopped by reason of the misconduct,[70] and the only sense in which there is a requirement of mutuality in respect of such estoppel is that if the other party takes advantage of the estoppel, he cannot thereafter make claims inconsistent therewith.[71]

§ 77. Certainty

Neither a waiver nor an estoppel will be deemed to exist in the absence of certainty.

Before an estoppel can be raised there must be certainty to every intent, and the facts alleged to constitute it are not to be taken by argument or inference.[72] Nothing can be supplied by intendment.[73] No one should be denied the right to set up the truth unless it is in plain contradiction of his former allegations or acts.[74] If an act or admission is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent with a right asserted by the party sought to be estopped, it forms no estoppel.[75]

A waiver must be manifested in some unequivocal manner;[76] it will not be implied or deemed to exist except where there has been some absolute, positive, and unequivocal action[77] or inaction inconsistent with the right in question.[78]

B. GROUNDS

1. Express Misrepresentations

§ 78. Representations

Generally an estoppel by misrepresentation arises when and if a false representation is knowingly or negligently made by one person to another ignorant of the facts with the intention that such other act thereon and such other does reasonably rely and act thereon to his prejudice.

Where a person willfully makes a representation intended to induce another to act on the faith of it, or where, whatever his intention, a reasonable man in the situation of that other would believe that it was meant that he should act on it, and in either case that other does act on it as true and alters his position, there is an estoppel in pais to conclude the former from averring against the latter a different state of things as existing at the same time.[79] An estoppel arising out of an express misrepresentation

"Equitable estoppel is bottomed upon the notion that, when one person makes representations to another which warrant the latter in acting in a given way, the one making such representations will not be permitted to change his position when such change would bring about inequitable consequences to the other person, who relied on the representations and acted thereon in good faith."—J. T. Fargason Co. v. Furst, C.C.A.Ark., 287 F. 306, 310, 311.

Reason for rule

"Equity holds a person to a representation made of a position assumed, where otherwise inequitable consequences would result to another, who in good faith relied thereon. . . . It needs neither consideration nor legal obligation to support it."—Illinois Standard Mortg. Corporation v. Collins, 63 S.W.2d 342, 344, 187 Ark. 902.

Amount of indebtedness

Where plaintiff's debtor made payment by assigning a debt due him from defendants, which defendants accepted, stating at the time that they were indebted to the assignor in a sum more than sufficient to pay the amount assigned, on which statement plaintiff relied, releasing all his remedies against his debtor, defendants were estopped to claim that they did not owe the full amount of the assignment.—Butters v. Oles, 214 P. 629, 124 Wash. 380.

Bank's collection of item

Where note executed by president of plaintiff bank was sent to defendant bank in ordinary course, and thereafter was sent to plaintiff bank for collection, and notice was given to defendant that it was collected, signed by plaintiff's cashier, and monthly reconcilement sheet treated it as collected, plaintiff was estopped to deny collection was in fact made, or from claiming wrongful payment from bank funds.—Keyes v. Security State Bank of Strasburg, N.D., 300 F. 897.

Contract rights

If a party to a contract or transaction induces another to act on the reasonable belief that he will waive certain rights or terms, he will be estopped to insist on such rights to the injury of him who was misled thereby.—Blackman v. Carey, 185 N.W. 87, 192 Iowa 548.

Nature of contract

Where, on death of landlord, his administrator entered into negotiation for sale of premises, and both administrator and purchasers consulted with tenant as to nature of his lease, and tenant represented that he held only under an oral lease, when in fact he was holding under a concealed written lease, tenant was "estopped" from claiming right to possession under the written lease.—Twisselman v. Reed, Cal.App., 110 P.2d 679.

Validity of contract

Fraternal society was estopped from pleading failure of its authorities to ratify prize offer by representation that award would be binding without such ratification.—Hood v. Polish National Alliance of U. S., 246 Ill.App. 137.

Representations in sale of property

Real estate company selling lots on representation that water would be furnished and mains provided could not claim ownership of water mains with right to remove same.—Suburban Real Estate Co. v. Incorporated Village of Silverton, 167 N.E. 474, 31 Ohio App. 452.

Estoppel to deny title

(1) Creditors, giving credit on face of debtor's apparent ownership of property, may invoke estoppel to deny his title.—Basak v. Damutz, 135 A. 453, 105 Conn. 378.

(2) Where a married woman in possession of property sold it, she cannot, having held herself out as owner and given a bill of sale of the property, show that it was the common property of herself and her husband.—Kurtz v. Cooperider, 127 N.E. 572, 73 Ind.App. 393.

(3) Where before plaintiff had fully paid a land contract with realty company of which defendant was president, mortgage on holdings of realty company was foreclosed without plaintiff's knowledge, and defendant continued to receive payments on contract, and after period of redemption expired defendant under an option redeemed land in his own name, defendant was estopped from setting up defense that company had no legal title after leading plaintiff to believe it had.—Commer v. Potter, 205 N.W 172, 232 Mich. 263.

Existence of street

Vendor's representations that a strip of land was a public way and a deed, naming the strip in describing the land conveyed, constituted an estoppel in pais, precluding the vendor from contending that the strip of land was not a public way or street.—Roger v. Struven, 186 P. 817, 44 Cal.App. 528.

Restrictions on use of land

One who sells a parcel subject to a restrictive covenant as to use and representing that the other parcels of the tract are subject to the same restrictions, such representation being an inducing factor in the purchase of such plot, is estopped to deny existence of such restrictions against the other parcels.—Turner v. Howard, 42 N.Y.S. 335, 10 App.Div. 555—Bimson v. Bultman, 38 N.Y.S. 209, 3 App.Div. 198—Sweet v. Hollearn, 252 N.Y.S. 202, 141 Misc. 135.

Defenses to action

Where delay in commencement of action was caused by plaintiffs' reliance on defendant's representation that decision in a similar previously commenced action would be determinative of plaintiffs' rights, defendant was "estopped" from pleading laches or the statute of limitations as a defense to plaintiffs' action.—Adams v. California Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n, Cal., 116 P.2d 75.

Under statute

(1) Statutes exist in some jurisdictions which expressly or in effect embody the rule of the text.

Ala.—White v. Glenn, 87 So. 331, 205 Ala. 303.

Cal.—Twisselman v. Reed, App., 110 P.2d 679.

(2) Under the Georgia statutes, where owner who remained ignorant of his title to land for twenty-seven years, despite convenient means of knowing thereof, induced one to buy land from third person by innocent misrepresentation that land was third person's property, such misrepresentation, coupled with delay in ascertaining truth, constituted "constructive fraud" which purchaser on faith of third person's title could plead as estoppel.—Lanier v. Change of policy as to payment of bonds

That American corporation whose bonds were payable in United States gold or in alternative specified currencies formerly announced a policy of paying undepreciated currency to bona fide foreign holders of bonds who had not purchased bonds for speculating after devaluation of American currency by congressional resolution did not prevent corporation from later insisting on its legal rights under the resolution which released the obligation of paying bonds in gold and permitted the payment in devalued United States currency.—Zurich General Accident & Liability Ins. Representations to others

That purchasers suing to rescind purchase contract for fraudulent misrepresentations of selling agents had in their employment by vendors represented to others same facts which they used as basis for action to rescind, did not estop them denying truth of such representations.—Dunn v. Security-First Nat. Bank, 21 P.2d 647, 131 Cal.App. 541.

Communication through others

However, the representation must have been made to the party setting up the estoppel, or must have been of such a character and made under such circumstances that the party making it must be taken to have contemplated that it would be communicated to, and acted on, by him.

tions not made with fraudulent intent[87] if the person making the same should have known of their falsity,[88] and if of such character as to induce a reasonably prudent man to believe that they were intended to be acted on.[89] If the representation is not such as should induce a prudent person to rely thereon, the person making it will not be estopped thereby.[90]

In some jurisdictions it is essential that the party to whom the representation is made must have in good faith been ignorant of the fact[91] and have had no convenient opportunity of ascertaining the

Time of representation

Misrepresentation must have been made at time of transaction for purpose of procuring benefit sought.—Fest v. Williams, Tex.Civ.App., 89 S.W.2d 1072.

Time of reliance

False representation must be representation of existing fact acted on before it is corrected.—Hopwood Plays v. Kemper, 189 N.E. 461, 263 N.Y. 380, reversing 264 N.Y.S. 924, 239 App Div. 820.

Action or inaction necessary

Vt.—Kimball v. New York Life Ins. Co., 126 A. 553, 98 Vt. 192.

Change of attitude or conduct

It is essential that the person urging the estoppel shall have changed his attitude or conduct on account of such representation.

Change of position

Okl.—Spencer v. First Nat. Bank, 243 P. 943, 116 Okl. 178.

Extent of change of position

(1) It is essential that party change his position to such an extent that he will be substantially prejudiced, not merely technically or formally, if the other be relieved from his representations.—Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Kimball, 94 P.2d 1101, 163 Or. 31.

Estoppel to plead negligent reliance

One making false representation acted on by another to his prejudice is estopped to plead negligence in relying thereon.—Johnson v. Sugg, Tex.Com.App., 291 S.W. 857, reversing Sugg v. Johnson, Civ.App., 284 S.W. 705.

Representation of nonreliance

Purchaser representing to vendor in application and contract to purchase land that he was not relying on agent's representations was held estopped to seek cancellation on ground of agent's misrepresentations not ratified by vendor.—Fortune v. Midland Farms Co., Tex.Civ.App., 8 S.W.2d 236, error refused—Lay v. Midland Farms Co., Tex.Civ.App., 8 S.W.2d 230, error refused.

Action not influenced

Fact that owners of premises without knowledge of defective work made affidavit that work by contractors had been completed to their satisfaction, for purpose of negotiating loan, did not estop them from later setting up cross action for defective work against contractors.—Clem Const. Character of representation judicial question

"The representations made must be in themselves sufficient to warrant the action taken, and their sufficiency is a judicial question. It is not enough that the person who heard them deemed that he was warranted in acting as he did; the language used ought of itself to furnish the warrant. One man might consider himself warranted in acting upon representations wholly insufficient to move a more careful and prudent person."—J. T. Fargason Co. v. Furst, C.C.A.Ark., 287 F. 306, 310, 311.

Display of sign as proof of ownership

The fact that oil company's signs were displayed at filling station owned by oil company did not estop oil company, in action for injuries caused by the alleged negligence of one operating the station, to maintain the defense that the one operating the station was an independent contractor rather than an employee and that oil company was not responsible for his negligence.—Reynolds v. Skelly Oil Co., 287 N.W. 823, 227 Iowa 163.

fact.[92] In this connection diligence in using means at command to learn the truth is essential[93] except where a confidential relation exists between the parties.[94]

A representation which is uncertain and vague cannot serve as a basis for estoppel.[95]

§ 79. Matters of Fact or of Opinion

Ordinarily only representations of material facts can create an estoppel, not mere expressions of opinion.

To create an estoppel the representation relied on must be a statement of a material fact, and not a mere expression of opinion.[96] A fortiori is this so where the representation is known by the party

Discovery of truth prevented

If discovery of truth is prevented by act of party making false representation, that the deceived party did not directly rely on the representation but tried otherwise to ascertain the truth does not prevent estoppel from operating.—Scott v. Burlington State Bank, 233 P. 835, 76 Colo. 582.

Equal means of knowledge

(1) Ordinarily, where equal means of knowledge are available to both parties, there is no estoppel.—Sundheim v. Beaver County Building & Loan Ass'n, 14 A.2d 349, 140 Pa.Super. 529.

(2) Where equal means of knowledge are available to both parties, as where in the case of title the public records can be examined, there is no estoppel.—Perry Coal Co. v. Richmond, 4 N.E.2d 891, 287 Ill.App. 298, transferred, see 200 N.E. 329, 362 Ill. 487.

Estimate of value

In lessee's action against lessor for conversion of property stored on leased premises, lessee was not precluded from giving opinion as to actual market value of equipment at time of conversion by the fact that prior to commencement of action he had stated, in effort to persuade lessor not to sell equipment, that such equipment represented "near one thousand dollars worth."—Gruber v. Pacific States Savings & Loan Co., 88 P.2d 137, 13 Cal.2d 144.

Matters of judgment

Representation as to matter not equally open to both parties is statement of fact, but representation as to matter resting merely in judgment of person making it is mere expression of opinion, if means of deriving information, on which fair judgment can be predicated, are equally open to both parties and no artifice or fraud is used to prevent person to whom made from making examination and forming his own judgment.—Emery v. Emery, Tex.Civ.App., 75 S.W.2d 725, error dismissed.

to whom it is made to be nothing more than expression of opinion.[97] Thus representations or opinions as to matters of law do not ordinarily base or create an estoppel[98] unless, as it is sometimes held, made under circumstances that render a repudiation inequitable,[99] as where a confidential relation exists between the parties.[1]

§ 80. As to Future Events

Ordinarily a representation as to the future or a promise cannot create an estoppel. To prevent fraud or injustice, however, a promise is sometimes made the basis of an estoppel if the promise has been made to induce action and has in fact done so, usually where abandonment of a right is involved.

The doctrine of estoppel by representation is ordinarily applicable only to representations as to facts either past or present, and not to representations or promises concerning the future which, if binding at all, must be binding as contracts.[2]

Representations of fact
Where corporation transferred bonds to stockholders who agreed to pay all additional federal taxes ultimately found to be due from corporation, stockholders' representations to commissioner of internal revenue regarding character of their possession of bonds constituted "representations of facts" and not "representations of law," and estopped stockholders from contending that bonds, contrary to commissioner's determination in reliance on such representations, should have been included in income for year in which bonds were received.—Taylor v. Notwithstanding the unanimity of the courts with respect to the preceding statement as the statement of a general rule, representations as to the future or promises have been enforced or permitted to operate as a basis of an equitable estoppel if to do otherwise would help perpetrate a fraud or cause injustice in a case where the representation or promise has been made to induce action or is reasonably calculated to induce action and has in fact induced action on the part of the party setting up the estoppel.[3] This exception has come to be known as the doctrine of promissory estoppel.[4] In such cases it is held that the party making the promise is estopped to assert lack of con-

Other statements of rule

(1) An estoppel might arise from a promise, even though without consideration, if it was intended that the promise be relied on, and in fact it was relied on, and a refusal to enforce it would be virtually to sanction the perpetration of a fraud or result in other injustice.—Fried v. Fisher, 196 A. 39, 328 Pa. 497, 115 A.L.R. 147.

(2) A promise which the promissor should reasonably expect to induce action or forbearance of a definite or substantial character on the part of the promisee, and which does induce such action and forbearance, is binding if injustice can be avoided only by the enforcement of the promise.

J. P. Morgan & Co., 2 N.Y.S 2d 520, 166 Misc. 455.

Promise inducing surrender of possession

Where plaintiff voluntarily parted with possession of cattle on which he had lien for pasturage, in reliance on promise of bank to pay debt of owner out of his funds, and mortgages were thereafter filed upon cattle, that plaintiff's lien may not have been technically lost did not prevent him from asserting bank's estoppel to break promise, the lien having been lost as to third persons by the surrender.—Holmes v. Aptitude of phrase

The phrase "promissory estoppel" used to designate doctrine that a promise which the promisor should reasonably expect to induce action or forbearance of a definite and substantial character on part of promisee and which does induce such action or forbearance is binding if injustice can be avoided only by enforcement of promise, is well chos-

sideration therefor.[5] Of course, a promise cannot be the basis of an estoppel if any other essential element is lacking.[6]

The most frequent application of the doctrine permitting a promise or representation as to the future to raise an estoppel has been said to be the well recognized exception to the general rule presented where the statement relates to an intended abandonment of an existing right, and is made to influence others who have in fact been influenced by it,[7] where substantial injustice will result unen as indicating that the basis of the doctrine is not so much one of contract with a substitute for consideration, as an application of the general principle of estoppel to certain situations.—Fried v. Fisher, 196 A. 39, 328 Pa. 497, 115 A.L.R. 147.

Basis of doctrine

"Promissory estoppel" is based on the same equitable principles as is "estoppel by silence," and, in either case, the one who is estopped has in effect stood by and, in violation of his duty in equity and good conscience to warn another of the real facts, has permitted the other to take some action detrimental to that other's interest, but in case of "promissory estoppel" a promise is made with the intention that it be acted on by the promisee.—Lacy v. Wozencraft, Okl., 105 P.2d 781.

Commercial or noncommercial promise

(1) In some jurisdictions the doctrine of promissory estoppel has been confined to charitable subscription cases.—Charles E. Quincy & Co. Arbitrage Corporation v. Cities Service Co., 282 N.Y.S. 294, 156 Misc. 83, affirmed Charles E. Quincey & Co. v. Cities Service Co., 1 N.Y.S.2d 654, 253 App.Div. 719.

(2) In others it is said that, although doctrine of "promissory estoppel" has ordinarily been applied only in charitable subscription cases, the mere fact that transaction is commercial in nature will not preclude use of that doctrine.—Robert Gordon, Inc, v. Ingersoll-Rand Co., C.C.A.Ill., 117 F.2d 654.

Renunciation, disavowal, or disclaimer of title or right as basis of estoppel see infra § 86.

" 'There is no rule more necessary to enforce good faith than that which compels a person to abstain from enforcing claims which he has induced others to suppose he would not rely on. The rule does not rest upon the assumption that he has obtained any personal gain or advantage, but on the fact that he has induced others to act in such a man-

less the promise is enforced.[8] It has been said that this is the only case in which a representation as to the future can be held to operate as an estoppel.[9]

§ 81. As to Validity of Bills, Notes, Bonds, Stock, Etc.

A person liable on instruments for the payment of money, promising to pay it or representing that the instrument is his valid obligation, without defense thereto, is estopped to deny liability or to assert defenses theretofore existing as to one purchasing the same in reliance on such promise or representation to his prejudice.

Where a person liable on a bill, note, bond, letter of credit, certificate of deposit, stocks, or other security promises a prospective purchaser or assignee to pay the same, or represents to him that the obligation is valid and that there is no defense to it, he is estopped to resist payment in an action by such person, who has taken the paper in reliance on his representation,[10] and will be precluded from ner that they will be seriously prejudiced if he is allowed to fail in carrying out what he has encouraged them to expect.' Faxton v. Faxon 28 Mich. 159, 161."—Fried v. Fisher 196 A. 39, 42, 328 Pa. 497.

"Wherever necessary to prevent renunciation from working a fraud upon the party misled, the doctrine is applicable and supplies the absence of a consideration for the promise."—Burgess v. California Mut. Building & Loan Ass'n, 290 P. 1029, 1032, 210 Cal. 180.

Consideration unnecessary

No consideration is necessary to support equitable estoppel created by payee of note telling maker she would not demand interest payment promptly when due.—Longbotham v. Ley, Tex.Civ.App., 47 S.W.2d 1109, error refused.

Intended abandonment by party to be estopped

Rule that representations may constitute estoppel if relating to intended abandonment of existing right means intended abandonment by person sought to be estopped, not person claiming estoppel.—Alameda County Title Ins. Co. v. Panella, 24 P.2d 163, 218 Cal. 510.

Limitation of easement

Where a real estate company represented that it would build only a boardwalk between lots and ocean, and a purchaser relied on such representations, the sale subjected the intervening land to a permanent easement in favor of lots sold to plaintiff, except that defendant might erect a boardwalk thereon, and defendant is estopped from asserting title to or selling such land—Phillips v. West Rockaway Land Co., 124 N.E. 87, 226 N.Y. 507.

Modification of contract

By subsequent oral agreement or representation, promisor may be estopped to contend that only written contract or executed oral agreement can modify written contract.—Alameda County Title Ins. Co. v. Panella, 24 P.2d 163, 218 Cal. 510.

Promise to cancel lease

Landlord who, in presence of prospective new tenants, informed tenant that landlord would execute lease with new tenants following day and would cancel tenant's lease was held estopped to deny he had agreed to cancel tenant's lease after tenant executed lease for other property, in reliance on statements of landlord—McNeill v. Harrison & Sons, 2 N.E.2d 959, 286 Ill.App. 120.

Right of preference

Conduct of judgment creditor mortgagee in inducing holder of his personal note to permit destruction of his note and take assignment of judgments estopped him from denying right to claim preference out of fund arising on mortgage foreclosure, as such conduct amounted to representation that judgments would be paid.—In re Barkley's Assigned Estate, 112 A. 113, 268 Pa. 370.

Statements held insufficient

Statements by plaintiff's sales and general managers made at sales meetings urging distributors handling refrigerators manufactured by plaintiff to continue in business during depression, and assuring them that they would regain losses and would receive financial assistance from plaintiff, could not be construed as expressing an intention by plaintiff to abandon right to cancel, without cause, a contract with distributor and hence such statements did not give rise to "promissory estoppel" precluding cancellation, especially where there was no showing that managers were authorized to renounce plaintiff's right of cancellation—General Electric Co. v. N. K. Ovalle, Inc., 6 A.2d 835, 335 Pa. 439.

Waiver of performance of contract

One who has waived strict performance of his contract and made promises on which the other party has acted and altered his position is estopped to assert rights which would work a hardship on the other party.

Guarantee of loan

Contractor's letter to bank, reciting that contractor would make check for subcontractor's estimate payable to subcontractor and bank jointly, was held to constitute guaranty of bank's loan to subcontractor, and contractor was estopped to deny liability thereon.—Watson Co. v. American Exchange Nat. Bank of Dallas, Tex.Civ.App., 284 S.W. 298.

Representation as to validity by assignor

S.C.—Thompson v. Hudgens, 159 S.E. 807, 161 S.C. 450.

Letter of credit

The issuer of an irrevocable letter of credit represents that it has in its possession funds with which to make good such credit and hence is estopped to deny that it received money or its equivalent as against one relying and acting on such let-setting up a defense which would have been good as between the original parties.[11] It has been held that it is of no importance whether the assurance was given with a fraudulent intent or by mistake only.[12] If there be no absolute promise to pay, there is no estoppel as to defenses arising subsequent to the representations relied on.[13]

In the circumstances under consideration the person liable on the instrument will not be permitted to assert that there has been a material alteration in the instrument,[14] that he did not execute it,[15] that the execution of the instrument was defective[16] or was procured by fraud and misrepresentation,[17] that it was void for nonconformity with the express requirements of a statute,[18] that it was barred by the statute of limitations,[19] that the instrument was invalid by reason of a defense of which he was ignorant at the time of the representation,[20] that he is discharged from liability as indorser for want of notice,[21] that the instrument has been paid,[22] or that it was not due according to its tenor.[23] However, to render this rule operative the representations must be outside of the face of the obligation,[24] and even though they are thus disconnected, if they are made simultaneously with the execution of the obligation, so that there is in effect but a single transaction, no estoppel will arise.[25]

Essential elements. In accordance with general principles heretofore stated, there must be a false representation,[26] made prior to the transfer of the instrument,[27] and the party to whom the representation was made must have been without knowledge or means of knowledge of the true facts,[28] since the party setting up the estoppel must have acted in reliance on the assurances given,[29] the rule having no application where the facts are equally known to both parties,[30] or where the party claiming an estoppel has not altered his position to his prejudice,[31] or where the representations relied on are not plain and positive and such as would mislead a person of ordinary prudence.[32]

Denial of acceptance of draft

Where the drawee of a draft for the rent of leased premises stated to the payee his reason for disregarding the draft was that the tenant had not shipped him enough cotton to pay it, and in answer to a ques-

So a bank is not liable in equity to the holder for the amount of an unaccepted check acquired on oral representations of the bank that the check was good, and that the holder might take it safely in payment of goods sold.[33]

Validity of signature. A person whose name has been signed to an obligation without his authority as maker, acceptor, or indorser, will be estopped to deny his liability if he so acts or speaks that the holder or intending purchaser is misled as to the validity of the signature, and purchases or relinquishes some right, or otherwise suffers an injury in consequence;[34] and this is true, although he may not actually have intended to ratify or adopt the signature.[35]

The fact of having paid or recognized similar notes will not estop one from contesting his liability on a promissory note on the ground of forgery.[36]

Want, failure, or illegality of consideration. If a person liable on a security for the payment of money represents to an intending purchaser or assignee that he has no defense and will pay the obligation, he precludes himself from afterward setting up a defense of want, failure, or illegality of consideration then existing to his knowledge;[37] but if instead of an absolute promise to pay he merely states that he has no defense to the note, he will not be estopped from setting up a failure of consideration arising subsequently to such statement.[38]

§ 82. As to Mortgages and Judgments

An equitable estoppel may arise with respect to a mortgage or judgment as to which misrepresentations have been made if the essential elements are present.

All essential elements being present, an estoppel may arise with respect to a mortgage or judgment as to which false representations have been made.[39]

tion as to when there would be enough cotton replied, "Eight or ten days," his statement was not sufficient to warrant the payee in believing that the draft would be paid when the cotton was shipped, so as to estop the drawee from denying he accepted the draft after the payee, relying on that statement, had failed to assert his statutory lien on the cotton.—J. Representation as to forged instrument

(1) Person whose name was forged to note is estopped to deny liability where before it was due he stated that, although he did not sign it, he would see it paid.—Marsh v. State Bank & Trust Co., 284 S.W. 380, 153 Tenn. 400, 48 A.L.R. 1365.

(2) It has been held that an admission in relation to an obligation not produced or identified, even if unexplained, does not warrant a finding that the alleged maker or indorser has ratified the forgery of his signature or estopped himself from denying his liability.—Sheller v. McKenney, 17 Ill.App. 185—21 C.J. p 1145 note 40 [a].

(3) If representation is that particular note offered for sale by specified person is genuine, the maker is estopped to assert a forgery even though he did not have the note before him when making the representation. The reason given for this rule was that if one of two innocent persons must suffer a loss, it must be borne by the one whose conduct has made the loss possible.—In re Varney, D.C.Ky., 22 F.2d 230, affirmed, C.C.A., Rutherford v. Elliott, 23 F.2d 250.

(4) It is otherwise if the representation is merely that a note signed by the maker exists and the note is not before the maker at the time.—Watkins Land, etc., Co. v. Howeth, 21 S.W. 315, 1 Tex.Civ.App. 277.

39. Inducing absence of creditor at foreclosure

A mortgagee, who falsely represented to judgment creditor of mortgagor, with intention that creditor rely thereon, that the mortgage was a good investment and that mortgagee did not desire to part with it, but that, if he should foreclose, he would notify creditor, was estopped to assert rights acquired by foreclosure without notice to creditor who, relying on the representations, did not appear at foreclosure sale, and refrained from insisting on a transfer of mortgage to him for the amount secured thereby as he had the statutory right to do.—Berarducci v. Diano, 198 A. 351, 60 R.I. 305.

Equal knowledge as to invalidity of mortgage

A mortgagor is not estopped to deny validity of a mortgage merely by indorsing notes of the mortgagee for renewal at a bank, after knowing the bank held the mortgage by assignment, he having previously informed the bank that it was invalid. He has done no act or made no statement on the faith of which the bank or any former holder acted to his prejudice in advancing money on the security of the mortgage.—Welch v. Graham, 124 N.Y.S. 945.

Good faith ignorance of facts necessary

A mortgagor was not estopped from disputing amount due by his statement to the then mortgagee as to the amount due, when the slightest care would have revealed a considerable difference between the amount actually due and that represented by the statement, since good faith ignorance of the true facts requires the exercise of due diligence to ascertain the truth.—Pattillo v. Tucker, 113 So. 1, 216 Ala. 572.

Reliance on representation

(1) A certificate declaring a previously executed mortgage to be a valid encumbrance on property cannot operate as an estoppel until some person has acted on the faith of it.—Purdy v. Coar, 17 N.E. 352, 109 N.Y. 448, 4 Am.S.R. 491, reversing 13 Daly 449.

(2) If the false statement was not designed to influence the assignment of the security, and was not relied on by the person setting up the estoppel, the party making it will not be estopped thereby.—Wilcox v. Howell, 44 Barb. 396, affirmed 44 N.Y. 398.

Thus a mortgagor or judgment debtor who makes a false statement, orally or in writing, to influence the assignment of the security or judgment, is estopped from taking advantage of it as against an innocent assignee who has relied thereon,[40] and the same is true of a grantee of a mortgagor who has taken subject to the mortgage.[41] So, too, the holder of mortgage notes who induces a purchaser to take them by representation that the mortgage is a paramount lien is estopped to assert that there is a prior mortgage.[42]

A mortgagee informing a purchaser of the property as to the amount due or extent of the lien is estopped to assert a greater lien or amount due after conclusion of the transaction in reliance on such representation.[43]

Where property, which was subject to mortgages, was about to be sold on foreclosure of the first, one who represented to the second mortgagee that he was the third mortgagee and agreed that, if the second mortgagee would refrain from bidding at the sale, he would, if he purchased the property, discharge the second mortgage, is, after having purchased the property, estopped from denying that he was the third mortgagee.[44]

The sale of land under a deed of trust by a sheriff having been at the request of the legal holders of the note secured, who were present at the sale, bought the land, and took the sheriff's deed, which recited that the sale was at their request, they cannot, as against one to whom they conveyed the land by warranty deed, assert any validity in the deed of trust or the note secured thereby, even if the sheriff was not one authorized by the deed of trust to make a sale under it.[45]

One representing to a purchaser of land encumbered by a deed of trust securing a note that the deed and note were collateral only is estopped from asserting the contrary.[46]

If the assignor of a mortgage of premises injured by fire makes proofs of loss and engages a third person to rebuild representing that he owned the premises, he is estopped to deny liability to such third person.[47]

Where a mortgagor, having only a life estate, but believing that he owned the fee, mortgaged the property and represented to the mortgagee that he owned the fee and the mortgage was foreclosed, and the land bought in by the mortgagee, the mortgagor, on acquiring the outstanding title, was estopped from relying thereon as against the mortgagee.[48]

Abandonment of right. A mortgagee assuring the mortgagor that there would be no deficiency judgment taken, thus reasonably causing the mortgagor to do nothing to protect himself against a deficiency judgment, is estopped to claim under such a judgment, such an assurance indicating an abandonment of an existing right within the exception to the rule requiring a representation to be as to a present or past fact, not a promise as to the future.[49]

§ 83. Admissions and Receipts

Admissions in judicial proceedings as creating estoppel are discussed in §§ 117, 118, 121.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 84. Admissions

Admissions may create an estoppel if other essential elements are present.

Admissions made with a knowledge actual or constructive of the facts, and with the intention, or reasonably calculated, to influence the conduct of another, and which have been relied and acted on to his prejudice by that other, are conclusive against the party making them as between him and the person whose conduct he has thus influenced.[50]

For an admission so to operate, the essential elements of an equitable estoppel must exist.[51] It must refer to the existence or nonexistence of some material fact,[52] with reference to the matter as to which the estoppel is asserted,[53] and in accord with the general rule requiring the representation to be made to the party asserting the estoppel, see supra § 78, no estoppel as a rule arises from admissions made to third persons who are strangers to the controversy.[54] Furthermore, to operate as an estoppel it is essential that the admission should have been relied on by the party claiming the estoppel,[55] justifiably,[56] and that he should have acted on such

Admissions not constituting estoppel
(1) Admission in application and notice for franchise to operate ferry that ferry was being operated by company whose franchise had expired does not estop applicant to deny franchise of such company.—Burnside Land Co. v. Connelly & Lee, 291 S.W. 409, 218 Ky. 346.

(2) An insolvent corporation was not estopped, as against a creditor, from claiming that money paid out to one holding stock as collateral was in payment of a loan by reason of a report of the corporation that there was an amount of stock outstanding, which amount included the stock held as collateral.—City Investing Co. v. Admission induced by party asserting estoppel
Where compensation of expert for advising insured as to method of reducing cost of life insurance was contingent on effecting savings, fact that insured followed such expert's suggestions, and in reliance on abstract furnished by him admitted savings had been effected, does not estop insured from denying that savings were effected.—Messick v. admissions to his detriment.[57] So where a person has procured another to make an admission for a particular purpose, he having knowledge of the actual facts, he cannot, in a suit against the party making the admission, insist on it as an estoppel.[58]

It has been held that no estoppel arises where the admissions were due to ignorance founded on an innocent mistake.[59]

The fact that an admission is made under oath does not make it conclusive as an estoppel if it would not otherwise operate as such.[60]

Certainty. Based on the rule that the facts of an estoppel must be certain see supra § 77, if an admission is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent with the right asserted by the party sought to be estopped, it forms no basis for an estoppel.[61]

Inconsistency. There is no estoppel as to facts not inconsistent with those admitted.[62]

Offers or attempts at compromise are not the basis of an estoppel.[63]

As to matters of law. While there is some authority to the contrary,[64] it is very generally held that an admission, in order to constitute an estop-

Admission after transaction

(1) Admissions made after the transactions to which they relate, and from which no loss could result to other parties in interest, do not operate as an estoppel.—Carland v. Day, 4 E.D.Smith, N.Y., 251.

(2) Hence, where architect's decision as to whether work and materials used by subcontractor complied with contract was made after subcontractor had completed the work, and did not influence him in performance of his undertaking, owner was not thereby estopped from suing for subcontractor's negligence, resulting in collapse of walls of building.—Hebbard v. McDonough, 139 N.E. 512, 245 Mass. 204.

Payment not legally due

(1) One is not estopped to deny liability by having made payment not legally due.—Juett v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., 53 S.W.2d 551, 245 Ky. 379.

(2) Thus property owner paying small repair bill on new railroad overpass to avoid suit was held not estopped to deny liability for subsequent repairs, where old bridge, which property owner had agreed to help maintain, had been destroyed.—Juett v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co., supra.

(3) Payment by participant in automobile collision of hospital bills of occupants of other automobile after he had taken such occupants to hospital immediately following accident and agreed to pay their hospital expenses was not admission of responsibility for accident so as to render such person liable for damage to other automobile.—Griessen v. Cook, La.App., 164 So. 260.

Part payment of debt

Mere payment of part of a debt by one not legally bound, which does not prejudice any one, will not estop him to deny liability for the balance.—O'Malley v. Wagner, 76 S.W. 356, 25 Ky.L. 810.

Request for extension of time to pay

That the debtor, after the maturity of the debt, asks the creditor for indulgence and promises to pay the debt if its collection is not pressed will not estop him from setting up the defense of partial failure of consideration, even though the facts on which that defense is based were known to him when he made the promise, creditor not having been placed in a worse position by such requests and promises.—Maxwell Bros. v. Harrison, 102 S.E. 372, 25 Ga.App. 14.

Absence of knowledge

Certificate of no defense to payment of mortgage debt on premises, executed by grantee of mortgagor, who neither knew thereof nor relied thereon to his detriment, was held not to create estoppel in mortgagor's favor.—Britton v. Roth, 169 A. 146, 313 Pa. 352.

Injury lacking

Brokers are not estopped to show that slip confirming sale of stock was issued by mistake, where no stock was sold on day in question at price specified in customer's order.—Landau v. Wollman, 258 N.Y.S. 947, 144 Misc. 541.

As to conduct of agent

Where a bank in which an agent had deposited funds of his principals to his own credit, with knowledge of their trust character, had procured their application in payment of a debt of the agent, the owners of the funds were not estopped to maintain a suit against the bank by taking notes of the agent, with personal security, for part of the amount, pursuant to an agreement for settlement made without knowledge by them that the bank had received the money, and which was not carried through, so as to constitute an accord and satisfaction.—Alexander v. § 85. Receipts

A receipt may create an equitable estoppel if the essential elements are present.

Receipts are not per se estoppels, but are open to explanation between the original parties and others not acting to their injury on the faith of them.[66] A receipt, however, may operate as an estoppel if the essential elements are present.[67] Hence, to the extent of such action and any consequent injury parties are conclusively estopped from disputing the validity of their own writings made for the purpose of inducing action.[68]

§ 86. Renunciation, Disavowal, or Disclaimer of Title or Right

Generally, one who by his renunciation, disavowal, or disclaimer of a right or title has induced another to rely and act thereon is estopped to assert such right or title.

One who, by his renunciation or disclaimer of a right or title, has induced another to believe and act thereon is estopped afterward to assert such right or title.[69] It is very generally held that such

Statement unnecessarily made

Generally, one is not obliged to inform others whether another is indebted to him, but, if he states that no indebtedness exists, he cannot thereafter deny the statement to the injury of those to whom it was made. —In re A. C. Becken Co., C.C.A.Ill., 75 F.2d 681.

Disclaimer in distinct proceeding

In suit by elevator company, in the nature of a bill of interpleader, an estoppel may arise from parol statements and declarations,[70] although in some jurisdictions it is held so far as land is concerned that where legal title is vested in one his mere oral disclaimer or admission of no title cannot devest his title.[71] So it has been held that such estoppel may arise from a written instrument other than a specialty,[72] from a formal disclaimer in writing,[73] from testimony, deposition, or affidavit,[74] or from allegations in pleadings,[75] and a representation as to the construction and effect of an instrument of obscure and doubtful character is equally good as an estoppel, if believed and acted on, as is a disclaimer of title to a person about to purchase.[76]

All essential elements of an equitable estoppel must be present for a disclaimer, disavowal, or renunciation to operate as such.[77] Thus in order to create an estoppel by conduct of this character it to determine claims as to proceeds of a carload of corn, as between the consignee, the carrier, and others, the claim of the consignee to the carload of corn was not defeated by its disclaimer in a suit by another against the carrier.—Omaha Elevator Co. v. Chicago, B & Q. R. Co., 178 N.W. 211, 104 Neb. 566.

One who represents that title is in another is estopped to set up title in himself.

Rule sparingly applied

The rule that one who has intentionally misled a prospective purchaser by disclaiming an interest in land is to be postponed to the party misled, being opposed to the statute of frauds, should be carefully and sparingly applied, and only on the disclosure of clear and satisfactory grounds of justice and equity.—Moore v. Henderson, 105 S.E. 903, 87 W.Va. 699.

Ambiguous deed

When the right disclaimed by a grantor is based on an ambiguous and uncertain clause in a deed, statements by him as to his intention and understanding of its meaning are entitled to peculiar weight by a prospective purchaser and constitute such constructive fraud as a court of equity will not tolerate as against a good-faith purchaser acting on the representations.—Moore v. Henderson, supra.

Judgment

Representation as to construction of doubtful judgment creates estoppel, if believed and acted on.—La Luz Community Ditch Co. v. Town of Alamogordo, 279 P. 72, 34 N.M. 127.

Utah.—Barber v. Anderson, 274 P. 136, 73 Utah 357.
"In the absence of estoppel, one does not lose title to real estate by a mere disclaimer of interest."—Wil-must appear that when the party against whom the estoppel is claimed made the declarations he was aware of the true state of facts;[78] that the declarations were made with the intent to deceive or with such culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud,[79] that the person by whom the estoppel is invoked was not a stranger to the transaction or one whose conduct the declaration was not designed to influence;[80] that he was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of facts but also of all convenient or ready means of acquiring such knowledge;[81] that he acted in reliance on the disclaimer[82] and altered his position[83] to his prejudice.[84] It has been held that the mere fact that one who has been induced by fraud to exchange lands states to a subsequent purchaser of the land exchanged, who has knowledge of, and participated in, the fraud, that he was satisfied with the exchange does not work an estoppel.[85]

Promise involving abandonment of right as basis of estoppel is discussed supra § 80.

Necessity of final judgment. A technical disclaimer in pleading, it has been held, will not estop the party pleading it or his privies until final judgment.[86]

Retraction of disclaimer. One who has denied owning certain property may afterward retract such disclaimer, provided no one is injured thereby.[87]

Misrepresentation of size of property

Landowner allegedly misrepresenting size of lot to city officials was not estopped as against mortgagee of adjoining lot from contending that mortgage covered part of landowner's lot.—Randolph v. Merchants & Mechanics Banking & Loan Co., 183 S.E. 801, 181 Ga. 671.

Discovery of truth prevented

Father obtaining credit for son by representing property to be latter's while withholding from record son's quitclaim deed to mother, in trust for father, was estopped to enforce interest in property as against son's creditor, although deed was recorded before trust deed was given and creditor did not rely on father's statements, but looked up records, since discovery of truth was prevented by father's failure to record deed at the time.—Scott v. Burlington State Bank, 233 P. 835, 76 Colo. 582.

Notice by record

Under statute as to record of conveyances as notice, where a deed had been recorded and a mortgage subsequently executed by the grantor was foreclosed, the prior grantee was not equitably estopped to claim title as against a purchaser at the foreclosure by reason of such grantee's disavowal of title, where such disavowal, if made, was subsequent to the sale, although prior to the time when the purchaser paid the bid price, as the purchaser's rights became fixed by his bid, and he was thereby bound to take whatever title the mortgage conveyed.—Otts v. Sheffield, 92 So. 268, 207 Ala. 125.

Party in possession

Disclaimer filed in mortgage foreclosure action, under a mistake of fact growing out of different descriptions of the same property, is not sufficient to divest title holder of his title and possession, when at the time of filing disclaimer he was in actual possession under fee-simple title, and remained in such possession at the time his title and possession was assailed by the purchaser at the foreclosure sale.—Langford v. § 87. Silence in General

While mere silence will not raise an estoppel when there is no duty or opportunity to speak, nevertheless an estoppel may arise from inaction or silence amounting to misrepresentation or concealment of the facts.

Mere silence of itself will not raise an estoppel.[88] To make the silence of a party operate as an estoppel the circumstances must have been such as to render it his duty to speak,[89] and there must

Duty to speak to prevent prejudicial action

(1) No duty to speak arises from the mere fact that a person is aware another may take an action prejudicial to himself if the real facts are not disclosed.—Lord Const. Co. v. Edison Portland Cement Co , 138 N.E. 39, 234 N.Y. 411, reversing 190 N. Y.S. 669, 198 App.Div. 584—In re Grube's Will, 7 N.Y.S.2d 194, 169 Misc. 170—First Nat. Bank of Fleischmanns v. Creamery Package Mfg. Co., 21 N.Y.S.2d 976.

(2) A landowner is neither "estopped" to claim title nor is he barred from asserting it by "laches," if his only fault is failure to sue to expunge from the public records a forged or void deed to lands in the possession of no one, which he neither made nor had recorded, although he knows or should know that one of the public unknown to him might purchase the property assuming the validity of the record of the void instrument.—Mosley v. Equal means of knowledge

(1) One is not estopped by silence where both parties know or have equal means of knowing the truth.

21 C.J. p 1151 note 92 [c].

(2) However, the rule is not applicable to a case where the apparent agreement of one party, with a claim made by the other, prevents the latter from making investigation.—Detroit, T. & I. R Co. v. Detroit & T. S. L. R. Co., C.C.A.Mich., 6 F. 2d 845, reversing, D.C., Detroit & T. S. L. R. Co. v. Detroit, T. & I. R. Co., 290 F. 549.

Knowledge of other's reliance

Mere silence does not work estoppel, unless action of person asserting estoppel was natural result of silence, and party maintaining silence was in situation to know of another's reliance thereon to his injury.

Nature of conduct to justify reliance

Estoppel by conduct, founded on the silence of the party whose duty it is to speak and so expose all the material facts of a transaction which are within his knowledge and of which the other party is ignorant, involves implied representation of existence of apparent facts, and to justify prudent man in acting thereon it must be plain and not doubtful.—Brichetto v. Raney, 245 P. 235, 76 Cal.App. 232.

Equal obligation

Where party claiming estoppel is under as great an obligation to inform the person sought to be estopped of the real facts as the latter is to inform himself, there is no

Nevertheless, an estoppel may arise from silence as well as from words.[92] "Estoppel by silence" estoppel.—Stern v. Sunset Road Oil Co., 190 P. 651, 47 Cal.App. 353.

Bad faith

(1) Silence, in order to work an estoppel, must amount to bad faith.

(2) Bad faith cannot be inferred from fact of which person sought to be estopped was ignorant.—Embry v. Long, 75 S.W.2d 1036, 256 Ky. 266—Shaw v. Farmers' Bank & Trust Co., supra.

Intent to deceive

Silence without intent to deceive cannot work an estoppel.—Scott v. Jardine Gold Min. & Mill. Co., 257 P. 406, 79 Mont. 485.

Knowledge before change of position

In a bank's action to recover on notes alleged to have been signed by defendant and her husband, but claimed by defendant to have been signed by her husband only, and that her own name thereto had been forged, plaintiff could not introduce evidence to show an estoppel of defendant to set up the fact of forgery because of failure to speak when required, where it appeared that before plaintiff's rights had been impaired in any way, defendant had denied signing the note.—First Nat. Bank v. Allen, 211 P. 913, 106 Or. 190.

arises where a person, who by force of circumstances is under a duty to another to speak, refrains from doing so and thereby leads the other to believe in the existence of a state of facts in reliance on which he acts to his prejudice.[93] Inaction or silence may under some circumstances amount to a misrepresentation and concealment of the facts, so as to raise an equitable estoppel.[94] When the silence is of such a character and under such circumstances that it would become a fraud on the other party to permit the party who has kept silent to deny what his silence has induced the other to believe and act on, it will operate as an estoppel.[95] This doctrine rests on the principle that if one maintains silence, when in conscience he ought to speak, equity will debar him from speaking when in conscience he ought to remain silent.[96]

Fraud

(1) Fraud is not essential in cases of equitable estoppel arising out of negligent silence, for negligent silence alone, coupled with both an opportunity and a real or apparent duty to speak, suffice for the creation of the estoppel, if the other party is induced by such silence to act to his prejudice.—A. S. Knowles Dry Goods Co. v. Gunter, 85 So. 735, 204 Ala. 411.

(2) Actual or intended fraud is not an element essential to equitable estoppel through silence or inaction, and neither affirmative acts or words nor silence maintained with fraudulent intent to deceive are indispensable elements, but estoppel arises only when the omission to speak is an actual or constructive fraud on the party invoking it or his privies; the existence of equitable estoppel through silence or inaction requires that the party against whom it acts remained silent when he had the opportunity of speaking and when he knew or ought to have known that his silence would be relied on, that action which his statement of the truth would prevent would be taken or omitted, and that injury of some nature or in some degree would result.—In re Grube's Will, 7 N.Y.S.2d 194, 169 Misc. 170.

basis of an estoppel in pais against him by silence, must be viewed in the light of the understanding he then had of his rights, and not in the light of such rights as they may be thereafter determined by the ultimate and conclusive adjudications of the courts.[97]

Failure of judgment debtor to assert invalidity of judgment. A judgment debtor who without objection stands by and suffers the assignment of the judgment against him to an innocent third person will be estopped afterward to assert the invalidity of such judgment.[98]

§ 88. Failure to Assert Title or Right in General

Under certain conditions, a person is estopped who stands by while he sees another commit, or be in the course of committing, an act infringing on his title or right.

Where a person stands by and sees another about to commit, or in the course of committing, an act infringing on his rights and fails to assert his title or right, he will be estopped afterward to assert it.[99] It is necessary to an estoppel that the party against whom it is claimed should at the time be apprised of his rights, since silence without knowledge works no estoppel;[1] and no estoppel arises unless it is the duty of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed to speak,[2] and unless he has the opportunity to speak.[3] It is further necessary that his silence or passive conduct actually misled the other to his prejudice.[4]

Silence or failure to assert title to property while it is being adversely claimed or occupied is not, of itself, sufficient to create an estoppel.[5] There can be no estoppel where the party claiming it was fully cognizant that he was invading the rights of another,[6] or where he was not justified in believing he had title to the rights involved.[7]

Knowledge of breach of condition of grant

Where plaintiffs' parents conveyed land to trustee for use for railroad purposes only and subsequently the land became a part of the public highway, plaintiffs and their parents were, under the evidence, chargeable with knowledge of breach of condition in the deed executed by the parents, as of the time when the highway was planned and being constructed and used as such by the public and the plaintiffs who failed to assert their rights until about ten years after the land had become a part of the public highway were "estopped" from maintaining an action of ejectment for recovery of the land.—Trowbridge v. § 89. Permitting Sale or Mortgage of Property

A person who knowingly permits his property to be sold or encumbered is estopped from setting up his title or interest as against a person who has been thereby misled to his injury.

A property owner who knowingly permits another to sell or encumber the property, without disclosing his title or objecting to the transaction, is estopped from setting up his title or interest as against a person who has been thereby misled to his injury.[8]

Applications and qualifications of this rule are discussed with respect to real property infra § 90, and with respect to personal property infra § 91.

§ 90. Real Property

An owner of real property who stands by without asserting his title while a third person sells or mortgages the property may be, under certain conditions, estopped as against the purchaser or mortgagee.

An owner of real property who stands by and sees a third person selling or mortgaging it under claim of title without asserting his own title or giving the purchaser or mortgagee any notice thereof is estopped, as against such purchaser or mortgagee, from afterward asserting his title;[9] and, although title does not pass under these circumstances, a conveyance will be decreed by a court of equity.[10] Especially is the rule applicable where the party against whom the estoppel is claimed, in addition to standing by, takes part in making the sale or mortgage.[11]

Elements of liability. To constitute an estoppel of the character under consideration, it is necessary that the subject matter of the sale or mortgage be something in which the interest of the party sought to be estopped is direct and immediate.[12] If there is an intermediate interest on which his own is dependent, he cannot be estopped.[13] An owner of property which another has assumed to convey without authority is not precluded by mere silence from subsequently claiming it.[14] It is indispensable that the party to be concluded should have been fully apprised of his title or interest,[15] and that he should have knowledge of the sale or transfer[16] or of facts sufficient to put him on notice thereof.[17] He should know that his land or interest is the subject of the sale or transfer.[18] It is not enough that he has notice that another is proposing to sell his property, and that he afterward does sell it.[19] Nevertheless, the phrase "stands by," within the equitable principle that one is estopped to claim title to land which, while standing by, he has permitted another to mortgage or sell, does not necessarily mean actual presence, but implies knowledge under such circumstances as render it the duty of the possessor to communicate it.[20]

To constitute an estoppel, it is essential that the party claiming it should be ignorant of the title or interest of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed,[21] and that he should have made due inquiries as to the state of the title.[22] No estoppel arises in favor of one having actual knowledge of the adverse title or interest,[23] where the party against whom the estoppel is claimed was in possession of the land at the time of the conveyance,[24] or where the party claiming the estoppel is bound with constructive notice by the public records.[25] One who owns land, and is either in possession of it, or holds it by a registered deed, is under no obligation to give notice of his title to one who proposes to purchase from another,[26] but he may not mislead the other party.[27] In accordance with the general rules stated supra §§ 71, 72 governing estoppel in pais, it is essential that the party setting up the estoppel should have relied on the conduct of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed,[28] and that by reason thereof he was induced to purchase, or to take a mortgage of, the land.[29]

§ 91. Personal Property

The owner of an interest in personal property, who, with full knowledge of his rights, permits another to sell, pledge, or otherwise dispose of it, will be estopped to assert his title as against a third person who has relied on, and has been misled by, his acquiescence.

Where a person about to purchase property in the possession of a stranger to the title honestly and properly asks of the possessor for information as to his rights, and such information is willfully refused, he may deal with the land on the presumption that the title is in fact as disclosed by the record, and the person in possession is estopped from setting up his claim to the injury of him to whom he refuses the information.—Marshall v. thorized or acquiesced in them.[34] It is essential that the party against whom the estoppel is claimed should have full knowledge of his title at the time of the sale,[35] and also that he should have knowledge of the sale, encumbrance, or pledge.[36]

To constitute an estoppel, it is essential that the party claiming the estoppel should be in ignorance of the other's title,[37] that he should have been induced to make the purchase by reason of his silence,[38] and that he has sustained injury thereby.[39] No estoppel arises where the party claiming the estoppel has not paid for the property.[40]

§ 92. Public or Judicial Sale

a. In general
b. Foreclosure sale

a. In General

An owner of property, who knowingly stands by and permits it to be sold at judicial sale without asserting his title, ordinarily cannot thereafter assert his claim as against persons misled by his conduct.

Although there is some authority to the contrary,[41] as a general rule, when a person having title to or an interest in property knowingly stands by and suffers it to be sold under a judgment or decree, without asserting his title or right or making it known to the bidders, he cannot afterward set up his claim.[42] Such an act, it has been stated, is clearly inconsistent with the idea of ownership on his part;[43] and the fact that there is no fraudulent intent on his part is immaterial.[44] If the owner has knowledge of an irregularity in the proceedings, but permits the sale to be made without objection, he is estopped to contest its validity afterward,[45] although there are decisions which hold that the rule has no application where the proceedings are void.[46] No estoppel arises where the act relied on as creating it is the result of illegal coercion;[47] and the owner is not estopped from claiming title by permitting the property to be sold at a judicial sale without renewing a claim previously dismissed.[48]

In order to create an estoppel it is essential that the party against whom it is claimed should have known at the time of the sale that his property was the subject of the sale,[49] and that the purchaser should have been in ignorance of the other's title to or interest in the property sold.[50] Mere silence, or the failure to intervene in the proceedings for the sale and to assert title prior to the sale, will not constitute an estoppel as against one who is not an innocent purchaser.[51] It is essential that the purchaser should have been misled by the other's silence,[52] and that he should have been induced thereby to make the purchase.[53]

While actual presence of the owner may not be necessary to constitute an estoppel,[54] a mere failure of an owner of property to attend a sale thereof of which he has notice creates no estoppel against him,[55] especially when it appears that he was pursuing another course which presumably appeared to him to be more proper and more likely to accomplish the result of stopping the sale.[56] Where the owner appears at the sale and gives notice of his claim to prospective purchasers, his failure to resort to other remedies afforded by law to prevent the sale does not constitute an estoppel.[57]

Effect of bid by owner. While there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[58] it is generally held that if the owner of property with knowledge of the facts bids on it at a judicial sale without giving notice of his title, he will be estopped thereafter to assert his title or contest the validity of the sale, to the prejudice of one who has acted in reliance on his conduct and in ignorance of the facts.[59]

On the other hand, it has been held that the owner is not estopped by bidding at the sale from setting up his title against the purchaser where he gives notice of his title at the time of the sale,[60] or where the facts are such as to put the purchaser on notice of his title.[61]

b. Foreclosure Sale

The failure of a mortgagor, present at a foreclosure sale, to object, while not estopping him from contesting its validity as against the mortgagee, will estop him as against a purchaser misled by his silence.

The mere fact that the mortgagor of property was present at its sale under foreclosure without objecting thereto will not estop him as against the mortgagee, or his assignee, from contesting the validity of the sale,[62] but such fact will estop him as against a purchaser who has relied on, and has been misled by, his silence.[63] Ordinarily one who fails to assert his title or right at a foreclosure sale will be estopped to assert his claim against one who in ignorance of the facts has relied on his conduct.[64]

Holder of recorded title need not make known existence of that title at public sale purporting to be in contravention thereof, although if statement is made in his presence requiring in good faith a denial, his silence is fraud and works estoppel, and, where deed to partnership realty was of record, heirs of deceased partner were not estopped to set up their title to deceased's interest because one of heirs was present at sale of all property of partnership and did not object, no representation having been made requiring objection.—Hurst v. Smith, 151 So. 825, 227 Ala. 664.

Right to compel marshalling of securities
Where a mortgagee procured an assignment of a subsequently executed mortgage on the same and other personal property, which was recorded before his mortgage, and sold all the property at foreclosure, the amount being insufficient to discharge both mortgages, it was held that a person who had procured the mortgaged property not included in the first mortgage on a trade with the mortgagor could not defend an action brought by one to whom he traded the property to recover the property given in trade for failure of consideration on the ground that the mortgagee was required to marshal the securities, where defendant stood by at the sale

Nevertheless no estoppel can be set up against one whose conduct is induced by a mistake of fact common to all the parties.[65] It is essential to the creation of an estoppel that the owner should have known that his property was the subject of, or included in, the sale,[66] that the purchaser should have been in ignorance of his rights,[67] and that the purchaser was induced by his conduct to make the purchase.[68] The grantee of a deed seasonably and effectually recorded is not estopped by mere silence with respect to his title at a sale foreclosing a mortgage executed by his grantor subsequent to the registration of the deed.[69] It has been held that, where the owner is evicted through a breach of the usual covenant of quiet enjoyment and warranty in a deed conveying land and has no actual knowledge of a covenant in a deed in his chain of title making other land, which with such owner's land originally constituted one parcel, primarily chargeable with the payment of a mortgage debt for which his premises are sold on foreclosure, he is not estopped from maintaining an action for the breach of such covenant of quiet enjoyment and warranty by reason of his silence at such sale.[70]

§ 93. Witnessing or Taking Acknowledgment

An owner of land who attests a conveyance or mortgage thereof by a third person without disclosing his interest is, under certain circumstances, estopped to set up his claim; but taking an acknowledgment to such an instrument will not work an estoppel.

A person who has title to, or an interest in, land, and who attests a conveyance or mortgage thereof by a third person and at the time of attestation is aware of the contents of the instrument and remains silent, is estopped to set up a claim to the land conveyed,[71] especially where he receives part of the purchase money.[72]

However, it has been held that the witness will not be estopped where he did not know the contents of the instrument;[73] where the grantee knew of the interest of the attesting witness,[74] or the condition of title was equally open to all the parties;[75] where the fact of the attestation did not influence any one to his prejudice;[76] where the grantor could not be estopped;[77] or where the instrument did not con-and made no objection.—Harrington v. Furr, 90 S.E. 775, 172 N.C. 610.

Sale of property as a whole

In corporate receivership proceedings, where mortgagee of part of corporate property prayed for foreclosure, and group of stockholders answered, praying for sale of corporate property as an entirety, and court signed foreclosure decree ordering sale of property as an entirety without objection, after group had received copy of proposed decree and notice of hearing thereon and failed to make any objections, a group of stockholders was estopped from asserting that property should not be sold as an entirety.—Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Ancillary agreement

One who signs agreement which is material to effect of, and ancillary to, instrument of sale expressly referred to in agreement is presumed to know contents of instrument of sale, although not party thereto, and, until presumption is removed, he is estopped from asserting, as against grantee in instrument of sale, interest in property sold based on any right then outstanding in himself.—Federal Intermediate Credit Bank v. Extent or duration of estoppel

vey a legal title,[78] although there is authority to the contrary.[79] One attesting a deed as a witness, conveying a part of a tract of land that he himself owned, is not estopped from asserting title to the other part, although the deed recites that the land adjacent to that conveyed belongs to the grantor.[80]

Taking acknowledgment. The fact that one who has title to, or an interest in, land takes an acknowledgment of a conveyance thereof by a third person without disclosing such title or interest creates no estoppel against him, although he may have knowledge of the contents of the instrument and of the condition of the title purporting to be conveyed.[81]

§ 94. Permitting Improvements or Expenditures

A person who knows the facts, and who, without objection, permits another to make improvements or expenditures on, or in connection with, his property, or in derogation of his rights under a claim of title or right, will be estopped to deny such title or right to the prejudice of the other.

One who with knowledge of the facts and without objection suffers another to make improvements or expenditures on, or in connection with, his property, or in derogation of his rights under a claim of title or right, will be estopped to deny such title or right to the prejudice of that other who has acted in reliance on, and been misled by, his conduct;[82] and a fortiori the rule is applicable where the party against whom the estoppel is claimed not only makes no objection but assists in making the improvements.[83] The estoppel may arise, although the period of acquiescence is very short.[84] It has been held, however, by some courts that while an owner who fails to object to the erection of improvements on his land may be estopped to claim the improvements, the principle cannot be carried to the extent of estopping him to claim title to the land in an action at law,[85] unless fraud lies at the base of the transaction.[86]

In order to create the estoppel the improvements must have been of a substantial character, otherwise the maxim, De minimis non curat lex, applies,[87] and they must have been made under such circumstances as would call for notice or protest.[88] The party against whom the estoppel is claimed must have a personal interest at the time the improvements were made,[89] and acquiescence or permission on condition that the work shall be so done as not to cause injury will not estop the party to maintain an action for damages.[90] It is essential that at the time the improvements are made the party against whom the estoppel is claimed should have been aware of his title to, or interest in, the property improved,[91] or if he was ignorant of his rights that such ignorance was not the result of gross negligence,[92] or that the title was not equally open to the notice of both parties.[93] It is essential also that the party claiming the estoppel should have acted in ignorance of the other's title or interest[94] and have been influenced by the conduct of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed.[95] No estoppel can be asserted against one who permits another

Improvements in lieu of rent

Where a father permitted his daughter and her husband to move on a farm which he intended to deed to them and required them to pay rent and later did not require them to pay rent, when they paid the taxes and made some improvements on the farm, it was held that the improving of the farm did not equal the payment of the rent and did not estop the father claiming title to the land.—Randles v. Nature of improvements to afford notice

A landowner who had no notice of the passage of ordinances by a borough determining the boundaries of an adjacent street, and who was not charged with notice by reason of improvements or otherwise that the borough was claiming property within his fences, was not guilty of laches in not attacking the ordinances, although he remained quiet for a number of years and the city made improvements in reliance on the ordinances.—Chain v. to make improvements without giving notice of his title where the means of knowledge is equally available to both.[96] Mere silence or failure to object does not operate as an estoppel in favor of one making the improvements, where he has knowledge of a convenient and available means of acquiring knowledge of the true state of the title,[97] or where the means of knowledge is equally available to both parties.[98] A landowner cannot excuse his failure to object on the ground that he was ignorant of his rights under a deed of record in his chain of title,[99] and his acquiescence in the drilling of an oil well on land excepted from a mineral deed justifies a conclusion that he had waived the exception.[1]

An estoppel will arise only where the party making the improvements or expenditures believes in good faith that he has a right to do so.[2] No estoppel arises where the party against whom it is claimed had no knowledge of the expenditures or improvements,[3] or that they were in contemplation.[4] If the owner, as soon as he is informed of the expenditures or improvements, protests against their continuance and asserts his ownership to the property on which they are being made, no estoppel arises;[5] and there can be no estoppel where the improvements are made after express notice has been given that the party sought to be estopped claims the property and over his objections.[6]

Improvements under void statute or ordinance. Where improvements are made under an unconstitutional law[9] or an invalid ordinance,[10] failure of the owner to object has been held not to work an estoppel, especially where he did not know that the statute or ordinance was invalid,[11] or where, having such knowledge, he resisted the making of the improvements.[12]

§ 95. Construction of Railroad

A person who permits the construction of a railroad on his land may be estopped to deny the right of the railroad company to use the property, although he may have a remedy in damages for injuries arising.

Applying the general rule stated supra § 94, where an owner permits the construction of a railroad on his land, he cannot, after the road is completed and large sums of money are expended on the faith of his apparent acquiescence, deny to the railroad company the right to use the property.[13] Under such circumstances, the owner forfeits his right to maintain ejectment[14] or trespass,[15] or a suit to enjoin the operation of the road.[16] Nevertheless, he is not precluded from a recovery of damages for injuries arising from the construction and operation of the road,[17] especially where the construction is authorized by law and where the owner of the land cannot complain,[18] although this rule may be rendered inoperative by agreement between the parties,[19] or by the positive conduct of the owner amounting to a waiver of his rights.[20]

No estoppel arises against the owner of land where at the time of the making of the improvements by the railroad he was not aware that the land belonged to him[21] or that valuable or permanent improvements were being made,[22] where he objected to every encroachment on his land,[23] or where it did not appear that the company's entry was induced or its occupancy sanctioned or acqui-

Disability of railroad

Where a traction company enters on land with the consent of the owner and constructs an interurban railroad track thereon, it may urge that the owner is estopped from ousting it, although it has not complied with municipal ordinances, and does not possess the right to hold land or construct and operate an interurban road.—Knowles v. Northern Texas Traction Co., Tex.Civ.App., 121 S.W. 232, error dismissed.

esced in by anything he said or did.[24] Further, an estoppel will not arise where the railroad is in possession under a lease subject to termination on notice.[25] It has also been held that the rule permitting an estoppel of the owner is limited strictly by considerations of public convenience.[26] A railroad which unlawfully occupies the land of another for a right of way may not hold it simply because possession would enable it more conveniently to carry on its business.[27]

Where a tax in aid of the construction of a railroad has been voted by the taxpayers of a municipality, and the company has constructed its road through the municipality at an expense greatly in excess of the amount of the tax, the taxpayers making no objection to the legality of the vote until after the completion of the road are estopped to object to the validity of the election,[28] unless it is shown that the vote was obtained by fraud of which they were ignorant at the time of such construction.[29]

Railroad companies, and their stockholders and directors, are mutually estopped by agreements between themselves in reliance on which large expenditures have been made without objection.[30]

§ 96. Improvements and Expenditures by Purchasers

A person who knowingly and without objection permits the purchaser of land to make improvements and expenditures thereon is estopped to contest his title where such purchaser has relied on, and has been misled by, his conduct.

Pursuant to the general rule, stated supra § 94, one who knowingly stands by and without objection suffers the purchaser of land to make improvements and expenditures thereon is estopped to contest such purchaser's title, where the purchaser has acted in reliance on, and has been misled by, his conduct;[31] and it is of no importance that there was no willful design to mislead.[32] The rule is applicable, it has been held, although the contract of purchase is oral where there is part performance,[33] or although the conveyance is void for want of a description of the land.[34]

However, no estoppel can arise unless the party against whom it is claimed had a present interest in the land at the time the improvements were made,[35] and was aware of his rights,[36] and unless he knew of the making of the improvements,[37] and unless the party making the improvements acted in reliance on his conduct.[38] No estoppel will arise where the improvements were made with full knowledge of the equities of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed and for the purpose of protecting the purchaser's rights.[39] Furthermore, the rule has no application where title to the property was acquired by fraud.[40]

Purchasers at judicial sale. As a general rule, where property is purchased at a judicial sale and the purchaser is permitted to make valuable improvements thereon without objection, the owner will be estopped afterward to question the validity of the sale and of the purchaser's title.[41]

However, to create an estoppel it is essential that the party sought to be estopped knew of the improvements,[42] and that the purchaser was misled by his silence.[43] A cotenant, estopped from asserting his claim by permitting a purchaser to make valuable improvements, may, nevertheless, purchase the interest of another, who is not barred and assert such interest.[44] Where a sale in a partition suit is void because made after the death of one of the tenants in common without revivor, his heirs are not estopped from claiming the land as against the purchasers by the fact that the latter made improvements thereon without their objection.[45]

§ 97. Improvements on Near-By Property

The failure of a landowner to object to improvements made on nearby property is no ground for estoppel unless he knew or could have foreseen that an injury to his own property would necessarily result.

A person is not justified in improving his land in reliance on a supposed right to use the land of another without ascertaining his rights;[46] and the failure of a landowner to object to improvements which he sees being made on property near his own is no ground of estoppel, as he is not bound to complain until his rights are encroached on,[47] unless he knew or could have foreseen that an injury to his own property would necessarily result therefrom.[48] The doctrine of estoppel cannot be invoked against a party when any protest on his part against expenditures for improving the land would have been an officious interference with the right of the owner to improve the property as he saw fit.[49] There can be no estoppel where there is nothing to charge the party sought to be estopped with actual knowledge of the improvements,[50] and an estoppel will not arise where the party claiming the estoppel has not relied on the other's conduct.[51] However, it has been held that if an owner sees the erection of structures which would necessarily injure his land and so acts as to justify the builder in believing that he desired compensation for damages, he can obtain no relief by injunction.[52]

Where a railway company has been allowed to construct its lines without objection by abutting property owners, and has expended large sums thereon, the operation of the line will not be enjoined by one who either gave his consent thereto or stood by and said nothing while the work was going on;[53] and an owner of property abutting on a street who has joined with other citizens in subscribing to a fund to provide a bonus to induce a railroad company to build a road, and who has agreed to secure permission from the city to operate tracks in the street on which his property is situated and to procure a relinquishment of damages from abutting owners, is estopped from claiming damages due to the construction of the road.[54]

§ 98. Failure to Assert Claim

Where a person having a claim sees another doing an act inconsistent therewith, and stands by in such a manner as to induce the person doing the act, and who might otherwise have abstained from it, to believe that he assents to its doing, he cannot afterward be heard to complain of it.[55]

However, to constitute the estoppel it is necessary that the party against whom it is claimed should be aware of his rights,[56] that there should have been a duty to speak,[57] and that the adverse party should have been actually misled,[58] adversely affected,[59] or induced injuriously to alter his position.[60] No estoppel arises as to a cause of action accruing subsequent to the act relied on to create the estoppel,[61] and there can be no estoppel where the party sought to be estopped took timely affirmative action to establish his claim.[62] Mere delay in asserting the claim will not operate as an estoppel.[63]

When inquiry made concerning claim. When a person having a claim is asked concerning it under such circumstances as to render it his duty to speak, and he fails or refuses to make it known, and another is thereby actually misled to his prejudice, he will be thereafter estopped to assert such claim.[64]

However, to make the silence of the party operate as an estoppel the circumstances must be such as to render it his duty to speak.[65] Further, it has been held that there is no principle which requires that evidence of title should be disclosed,[66] or that an account be rendered where the interest of another may depend on the state of the account so long as nothing is done to mislead.[67]

§ 99. Failure to Assert Lien

A lienholder whose failure to assert his lien results in injury to another may be estopped.

If a mortgagee or other lienholder stands by while another acquires an interest in the property, and fails to make known or assert his lien, he will be afterward estopped to do so to the prejudice of that other.[68]

Advice of attorney

The fact that the delay in bringing a cause of action was due to the advice of an attorney of recognized ability that plaintiff had no cause of action is a complete answer to the defense of estoppel, especially where defendant, by bringing suit on notes held by it, could have secured a settlement of all the issues involved.—Weidenfeld v. Specification of particular claims

A grantee taking property charged with lien of deed of trust could not complain that mortgagee was estopped from claiming, as part of lien indebtedness, any amount for taxes and insurance premiums paid by mortgagee by failing to state that indebtedness included such items when asked amount of indebtedness by grantee's agent, where sums paid for taxes and insurance premiums were incorporated into amount of indebtedness by provision in deed of trust.—Bryan v. However, the circumstances must be such as make it the duty of the lienholder to assert his lien.[69] He will not be estopped where he did not know that the particular property sold was subject to the lien,[70] or where his conduct did not mislead the other party or in any way affect the transaction.[71] Where the lien sufficiently appears of record his mere silence does not constitute an estoppel;[72] and an estoppel does not arise where the facts communicated to the party claiming the estoppel by the party against whom it is claimed, although falling short of notifying him of the extent of the lien, were sufficient to call attention to it and raise an inquiry as to the amount from a prudent man.[73]

§ 100. Concealment of Facts

A person who, by concealing facts, induces another to act in a particular manner will be estopped to set up such facts to the other's prejudice.

Where a person by concealing facts in his possession induces another to act in a manner other than he would have acted had he known such facts, he will afterward be estopped to set up such facts to the other's prejudice.[74]

§ 101. Surrender of Possession of Property

The surrender of possession of property will not estop the party surrendering it from subsequently asserting a right or title thereto unless the circumstances indicate a disclaimer.

The mere surrender of the possession of property to another is not sufficient to estop the party surrendering it from subsequently asserting a right or title thereto,[75] but he may be estopped when the circumstances are such as to indicate a disclaimer of such right or title and it would be inequitable to

Answer to inquiry made

Where mortgage given executor by heir of estate on heir's interest was recorded, executor was under no duty, in answering inquiry as to encumbrances against estate of deceased, to do more than make correct answer, and failure to disclose encumbrance against estate of heir did not estop him from claiming under his mortgage.—Halbert v. Subsequent conduct

That officer of mortgagee, after learning that, prior to execution of mortgage, purchaser of timber from mortgagors under contract giving seven years for removal of timber had received extension agreement from mortgagors, did not inform purchaser of existence of mortgage, did not estop mortgagee from foreclosing mortgage as to standing timber, since conduct relied on to raise estoppel must have been concurrent with, or anterior to, action alleged to have been influenced.—Elmonte Inv. permit him to assert the contrary.[76] The party claiming the estoppel must not have had knowledge of the other's claim and must not have been guilty of negligence in failing to ascertain such claim.[77]

3. Negligence

§ 102. Negligence in General

Generally, one who in the transaction in dispute has by culpable negligence led another into the belief of a certain state of facts, proximately causing such other, without negligence on his part, to act on such belief to his prejudice, will be estopped to show that the state of facts referred to did not exist except where the wrong was accomplished by a criminal act on the part of another.

A recognized proposition as to estoppel in pais is that if in the transaction itself which is in dispute a party has led another into the belief of a certain state of facts by conduct of culpable negligence calculated to have that result, and such culpable negligence has been the proximate cause of leading, and has led, the other to act by mistake on such belief to his prejudice, he cannot be heard afterward as against that other to show that the state of facts referred to did not exist.[78] Since in order to cre-

Misrepresentation by another

The term "estoppel by negligence" may be applied to the class of cases where a man is estopped by another's misrepresentation, if, in breach of some duty to the person deceived, he has supplied the person making the misrepresentation with that which was necessary to make it credible.—Sugg v. Delay

(1) In determining what constitutes unreasonable delay in asserting rights, creating estoppel, court

ate an equitable estoppel it is not necessary that there should be an intentional moral wrong, see supra § 69, negligence, when there is a duty cast on a person to disclose the truth, may supply the place of intent, where the effect of such negligence is to work a fraud on the party setting up the estoppel.[79]

However, the negligence to operate as an estoppel must have been the neglect of some duty owing to the party claiming the estoppel or to the general public.[80] In addition, it must be in the transaction itself, and be the proximate cause of leading the party into mistake and loss.[81] In no event can an estoppel arise in favor of one who has been guilty of contributory negligence.[82] An estoppel resting wholly on equity cannot be used to shift a loss from one careless person to another when the loss could not have happened without the earlier negligence of plaintiff, and the later negligence of defendant at most only contributed to the result.[83] Further, it is generally held that, where the wrong was accomplished by a criminal act, the crime, and not the negligent act of the party which made it possible, is the proximate cause.[84] As between must regard circumstances, nature of case, and relief sought, as well as rights of defendant.—State ex rel. Adams v. Coon, 295 S.W. 821, 221 Mo. App. 987.

(2) Seller's delay for ten days in notifying buyer that it would not accept order given agent was not so unreasonable as to estop it from setting up that no contract was made.—Thane Lumber Co. v. J. L. Metz Furniture Co., C.C.A.Ark., 12 F.2d 701.

Forged indorsement

To make out estoppel for failure of payee to protect himself against his agents collecting proceeds on forged indorsement, it is not enough to show that payee failed to protect himself or public against consequences of forgery, but it must be shown that payee was careless as to some duty owing to maker of note, who was thereby led into paying note to third party.—Oil State Refining Co. v. Duty to anticipate crime

No person owes another any duty to anticipate a crime will be committed, and negligence cannot be predicated on failure to act on that belief.—Schumann v. Bank of California, National Ass'n, 233 P. 860, 114 Or. 336, 37 A.L.R. 1531.

Forgery

(1) A forged instrument ordinarily cannot be made the basis of an estoppel by negligence.—Southern States Building & Loan Ass'n v. Mason, Tex.Civ.App., 29 S.W.2d 839.

(2) Payee's carelessness in allowing bookkeeper, who previously misappropriated funds, to handle payee's checks, was not a defense in suit against bank to recover value of check paid by defendant to bookkeeper on latter's forged indorsement of payee's name.—First Nat. Bank v. Montgomery Cotton Mfg. Co., 101 So. 186, 211 Ala. 551.

the original parties to a transaction one fraudulently misled into signing a paper without reading it is not estopped by his negligence from setting up the fraud.[85]

§ 103. Acts Causing Injury to One of Two Innocent Parties

As a general rule, where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he whose conduct, act, or omission enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it if the other party acted in good faith, without knowledge of the facts, and altered his position to his detriment.

It is a widely recognized principle that wherever one of two innocent persons must suffer by the acts of a third, he who by his conduct, act, or omission has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it.[86] Equity will not postpone the

(3) Although a person whose name has been forged or signed without authority, not amounting to forgery, may be estopped by his negligent failure to give notice to the person imposed on for an unreasonable time after discovery, he is not estopped by failing to discover the forgery.—Looymans v. Chatham & Phenix Nat. Bank, 200 N.Y.S. 898, 121 Misc. 152.

(4) Owner and holder of note was not guilty of negligence in failing to protect itself against forgery of indorsement.—Oil State Refining Co. v. Bryant, 236 P. 431, 110 Okl. 83.

Limitations of rule. While the rule stated supra this section is one of quite general application and where properly understood and limited is one of manifest equity, it has, however, many limitations and qualifications[89]. The rule, it has been stated, is mainly confined to cases where the third person whose act or default has occasioned the loss has been in some sense or to some extent the agent of the party who is made to sustain the loss, or when the latter by his acts or negligence has authorized the other party to consider him as such.[90] Furthermore, in accordance with well settled general principles governing equitable estoppels, no estoppel can arise where all the parties interested have equal knowledge of the facts,[91] or where the party setting up the estoppel is chargeable with notice of the facts,[92] or is equally negligent or at fault.[93] Likewise, an estoppel does not arise where no fault or

Cases not within rule

(1) Bona fide purchaser of nonnegotiable paper, such as conditional sales contract, could not cut off defenses to nonnegotiable instrument on theory of estoppel, on ground that when defendant signed and put contract in circulation it thereby made possible loss which occurred by reason of its assignment.—Universal Credit Co. v. Rule otherwise stated

"The rule . . . [of comparative innocence] does not apply when the wrongdoer has not been vested by the party sought to be charged with the ordinary indicia of ownership and right of disposal of property, or an apparent authority to do the act from which the loss must accrue to one of two innocent parties."—Bacal v. negligence is imputable to either party,[94] but it has been held that negligence is immaterial as respects application of the rule of estoppel where one party's confidence put it into the hands of the wrongdoer to perpetrate the wrong.[95]

The act, conduct or omission warranting imposition of liability must occur in the transaction in question and be the proximate cause of the loss.[96] The rule does not apply in cases where the wrong was accomplished through the instrumentality of a criminal act, it being held that in such cases the crime, and not the negligent act, is the proximate cause of the injury.[97] A party may not

Rule otherwise stated and explained

"Under a literal interpretation of it [rule of comparative innocence], if C introduced B to A, and B then defrauded A, C should be held liable for the resulting loss on the theory that his introduction of B to A 'made the fraud possible.' This principle has never been carried by the courts to . . . absurd lengths . . . though it is often oracularly quoted as though it should be taken literally and applied indiscriminately as the touchstone of responsibility wherever fraud appears. The rule can be invoked only with the qualification that the words 'enabling a person to cause the loss' must be understood to mean by some act, conduct, or default in the very transaction in question."—Fifth St. Building & Loan Ass'n of Philadelphia v. claim an estoppel where he has not altered his position to his detriment, or sustained loss by reason of the conduct of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed.[98]

§ 104. Clothing Another with Apparent Title or Authority

Where the true owner of property clothes another with apparent title or authority over it and a third person in good faith relies on such ostensible ownership, the true owner is estopped to assert title or power over the property or to deny the title of the ostensible owner.

As a general rule, where the true owner of property holds out another, or allows him to appear as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third persons are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner or person having such apparent power of disposition, they will be protected,[99] regardless of whether the true owner has been negligent in intrusting the property to the wrongdoer.[1] However indisputable were the intentions of the owner not to surrender his ownership, when he has surrendered the possession and exhibited the person who has that possession to the world as one having the power to dispose of the property, he will not be heard against an honest buyer who has acted on the confidence imprudently reposed by the owner.[2] In such cases the rights of such third persons do not depend on the actual title or authority of the party with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing as against them the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the conveyance.[3] The rule is especially applicable where the owner has encouraged the parties to deal with each other.[4]

Nevertheless, the rule, although general in its terms, operates only to protect those who, in dealing with others, exercise ordinary caution and prudence,[5] and it is essential to its application that the conduct of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed should clearly amount to the clothing of another with title to, or authority over, the property in question.[6] Further, in accordance with general rules, no estoppel arises in favor of one whose acts were not influenced by such conduct,[7] or who has suffered no injury therefrom.[8]

Particular acts creating estoppel

(1) Party is estopped from disputing record title when, by his own negligence, he has held title out to world by means of public record as being good title.—Reasoner v. Fiskelli, 153 So. 98, 114 Fla. 102.

(2) Vendor must stand loss of bargain where signing blank contract of sale and enabling his agent to secure contract with purchaser—Meder v. Silver, 9 S.W.2d 1089, 225 Ky. 733.

(3) Where partnership permitted partner to take title to land in his individual name, and partner executed deeds as security for a personal debt, it was estopped to deny his title as against party taking deeds in good faith—Shoptaw v. Sewell, 81 S.W.2d 29, 190 Ark. 639.

(4) Owner by assisting in completion of new relation between himself and coowner, latter's sale to third person of coowner's interest and vesting legal title in third person, bound himself, heirs, and representatives by election.—Wollenberger v. Hoover, 179 N.E. 42, 346 Ill. 511.

(5) Bank which delayed recording mortgage and whose cashier assured materialmen, before performance of their contract, that property was clear and that bank would finance construction, was held estopped to assert priority by reason of recording its mortgage before filing of lien notices.—Ash v. Honig, C.C.A.N.Y., 62 F.2d 793, certiorari denied Suffern Nat. Bank & Trust Co. v. Ash, 53 S.Ct. 405, 288 U.S. 614, 77 L.Ed. 988.

ciple is especially applicable where he actively advises the party setting up the estoppel to deal with the person whom he has clothed with apparent title to or authority over the property.[10]

However, in order to create the estoppel, there should be either knowledge of his rights in the property on the part of the party estopped[11] or else something which fairly puts him on inquiry to learn the true facts,[12] and also knowledge of the dealings in which the title to or authority over the property is involved,[13] and the existence of circumstances which impose on him the duty to make known his rights to the party claiming the estoppel.[14] There can be no estoppel where the owner did not by words or conduct hold out another as having title.[15] Mere possession by a third person of an undelivered deed does not create an apparent authority to transfer title to another sufficient to estop the grantor of the deed from asserting title.[16] Further it is essential that the party claiming the estoppel should have been ignorant, or not chargeable with knowledge, of the rights of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed;[17] and there can be no estoppel in favor of persons who did not act in reliance on the acts or representations of the party whom it is sought to estop.[18] Ordinarily an estoppel cannot be based on an appearance of

(6) Owner of beneficial interest, not shown of record, may be estopped to assert it against bona fide judgment creditor or subsequent purchaser from judgment debtor when such creditor or purchaser at judicial sale under judgment may reasonably have acquired substantial rights on faith or by reason of record showing interest in judgment debtor.—Laganke v. Sutter, 187 So. 586, 137 Fla. 71—Little v. Saffer, 148 So. 573, 110 Fla. 230—First Nat. Bank v. Savarese, 134 So. 501, 101 Fla. 480.

(7) One inducing forgery of deed from his wife to another cannot question transfer of interest in land by latter.—Breckenridge v. Coffield, Tex.Civ.App., 283 S.W. 310

Transfer to enable grantee to obtain credit

While the mere fact that one places title in another does not create an estoppel, an owner who transfers realty to another for purpose of enabling latter to obtain credit may be estopped from repudiating record title, as against creditors who have extended credit on faith of ownership of land.—Furer v. Real Estate Corporation, 154 A. 543, 108 N.J.Eq. 221.

Taking title in another's name to facilitate resale

That a person took purchased land in the name of his agent for the reason that he could more readily sell the property, or sell it at a better price than if in his own name, was not in itself unlawful or fraudulent so as to estop him from claiming title.—Biles v. Walker, 83 So. 411, 121 Miss. 98, motion sustained 83 So. 753.

Delay in recording a deed or failure to assert ownership promptly will not, of itself, divest one of title, and statutes of registration and limitation are intended to give protection against such negligence or indifference of the landowner.—Simonds v. Stanolind Oil & Gas Co., 114 S.W.2d 226, 134 Tex. 332, reversing 103 S.W.2d 784, rehearing denied 136 S.W.2d 207, 134 Tex. 332.

Retention of record title

Possession by son with claim of title, although father is record owner, and continues to pay taxes, does not authorize extension of credit to son, estopping father from reclaiming land.—Cooke v. Fenner & Beane, 108 So. 370, 214 Ala. 558.

Reliance on owner's acknowledgment as tenant

Party was not estopped from claiming title to land because he had acknowledged himself as tenant of record owner of land, and his wife had contracted to purchase it, where plaintiff did not have knowledge of such acts at time of his purchase and was not induced thereby to purchase the land.—Franklin v. Smith, Tex.Civ.App., 265 S.W. 715.

Judgment creditor

Grantee's failure to record deed until after rendition of compromise judgment did not estop her to claim the land as against judgment creditor, as creditor was not prejudiced, and did not extend credit on strength ownership accomplished through the instrumentality of a criminal act.[19]

Apparent title in husband. Where the apparent title to, or authority over, real property belonging to a wife is by her permitted to be in her husband, and third persons on the strength of such apparent title or authority acquire rights therein, she will be estopped to deny such title or authority.[20] Especially is this so where she not only acquiesced in but actively assisted in making a sale of the property for her husband's benefit.[21]

Nevertheless, to create an estoppel against the wife it is essential that she should have had knowledge of her title to the property in question[22] and of the facts out of which it is claimed the estoppel arose.[23] It is also essential that the party claiming the estoppel should have been ignorant of her rights or that there should have been nothing to bind him with notice thereof,[24] and that his acts which resulted in prejudice to him were committed in reliance on the wife's conduct.[25] An exception to the rule has also been asserted in the case of judgment creditors of the husband.[26]

The principle just stated has been applied in varying circumstances to different kinds of personal property,[30] and it has been held immaterial whether choses in action are negotiable or nonnegotiable as respects the creation of an estoppel as a result of the placing of apparent title in another.[31]

The principle has been applied to bills of lading,[32] bonds,[33] certificates of deposit,[34] checks,[35] county warrants,[36] duebills,[37] insurance policies,[38] and notes and mortgages.[39] Likewise, the principle

Apparent title in husband. A wife who knowingly permits her husband to deal with her personal property as his own will be estopped to assert her ownership against persons who have dealt with the husband in reliance on his apparent ownership or authority.[41] However, it is essential that the party claiming the estoppel should have acted in good faith in reliance on the strength of the husband's apparent ownership or authority,[42] and that he was prejudiced by reason thereof.[43]

b. Limitations of Rule

An owner of personal property will be estopped to deny another's ostensible title or authority over it only where, in addition to conferring possession, his acts or conduct are such as to mislead others as to the true ownership, and where the person claiming the estoppel has acted in good faith, without knowledge of the facts, and has suffered loss in dealing with the apparent owner.

In order that the real owner of personal property may be estopped to assert his title against one who has dealt with the apparent owner on the faith of his apparent ownership of, or authority over, it, something more is required than mere possession on the part of the apparent owner,[44] since merely

(1) Surety, investing principal with apparent authority to deliver note, is estopped to deny obligation to innocent holder.—Brown's Adm'r v. Wilson, 1 S.W.2d 767, 222 Ky. 454.

(2) Where mortgagee, through conduct, caused mortgagor to believe that real estate dealer was mortgagee's agent for receiving payments, and dealer appropriated part of payments to his own use, mortgagee, whose negligence made it possible for dealer to commit wrong, must suffer loss.—Millious v. Thompson, 20 P.2d 1060, 94 Mont. 110.

(3) Where owner clothed coöwner with apparent title to certain notes and coöwner's creditors without knowledge of facts dealt with coöwner on faith of his ownership of the notes, failure of creditors to comply with negotiable instruments act in accepting assignment of notes from the coöwner to secure their claim did not affect their right to claim that owner was estopped from asserting superior interest in the notes.—Crockett v. Rogers, Tex.Civ. App., 137 S.W.2d 185, error dismissed, judgment correct.

Note traded by third person

Purchaser for value of nonnegotiable note indorsed in blank by holder named on its face was not put on notice of any equity that might exist in favor of holder merely because note was offered in trade by third person.—Morris v. Packard Dallas Co., 86 P.2d 779, 184 Okl. 277.

intrusting a third person with possession does not constitute holding him out as owner.[45] While possession may be prima facie evidence of ownership, it is as consistent with other theories, that is, that the person in possession is a bailee or wrongdoer.[46] The owner must go farther, and do, or omit to do, some act of a nature such as to mislead persons as to the true possession of the title.[47] There must be a fraudulent or deceptive purpose in view, or implied from the special circumstances of the case on the part of the true owner,[48] or at least there must be some act or conduct on the part of the real owner whereby the party selling, or otherwise dealing with the property, is clothed with the apparent ownership or authority to sell, and which the real owner will not be heard to deny or question to the prejudice of an innocent third person dealing on the faith of such appearances.[49]

Bailee or trespasser

Where the possession of a seller or pledgor of personalty is that of a bailee or trespasser, the rule that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, the loss must fall on him whose act or omission made the loss possible does not operate in favor of the pledgee or vendee, who stands in no better position than a person who innocently purchased or acquired stolen property, the owner being entitled to reclaim it where found.—Leitch v. Retention by seller

The mere fact that buyer leaves personal property in possession of seller is not evidence of seller's right to sell property and does not give seller external indicia of right of its disposition.—Guthrie v. Hendley, 193 S.E. 80, 56 Ga.App. 438.

Possession by dealer

(1) Although article is allowed to remain in possession of mortgagor for apparent purpose of resale, mortgagee is not estopped to assert title as against bona fide purchaser from mortgagor, if mortgagor is without authority to sell.—General Credit Corporation v. Rohde, 187 A. 676, 122 Conn. 100.

(2) That owner intrusts chattels with dealer in similar merchandise and permits their exhibition for purpose of obtaining offers of purchase has been held insufficient to work estoppel to claim title.—Utica Trust & Deposit Co. v. Acts or conduct not creating estoppel

(1) One delivering goods to warehouse for processing and storage, separate from those of other shippers, was not estopped to claim title against innocent purchaser from warehouse.—Kendall Produce Co. v. Terminal Warehouse & Transfer Co., 145 A. 511, 295 Pa. 450.

(2) That employer continuously left cattle in employee's possession did not vest in employee indicia of title sufficient to protect one dealing with him as owner.—Irick v. Elkins, 28 P.2d 657, 38 N.M. 113.

(3) Transferee of shares of stock in bank did not clothe another with apparent ownership by permitting him to vote stock and collect dividends where he had no knowledge of the latter's assertion of title.—Mitchell v. Newton County Bank, 282 S.W. 729, 220 Mo.App. 223, followed in Mitchell v. Newton County Bank, App., 282 S.W. 733.

(4) Signing in blank of nonnegotiable instrument by original holder is not sufficient to estop holder from thereafter asserting his title to in-

The rule as to estoppel of the party conferring ostensible ownership or authority on another protects only those who in dealing with the apparent owner act in good faith with ordinary caution and prudence, without actual or constructive knowledge of the true owner's rights.[50] The person alleging the estoppel must have acted and parted with value on the faith of such apparent ownership or authority so that he will be the loser if the appearances to which he trusted are not real.[51] It follows that an owner of personal property who permits another to appear as owner of it is not estopped to assert ownership as against judgment creditors of the latter, since a judgment creditor can never become an innocent purchaser of property sold under his writ of execution but takes only the title of his judgment debtor, and, if the judgment debtor has no title, he takes none.[52]

A seller of personalty taking a forged check in payment for goods is not estopped to claim title as against a transferee from the purchaser.[53]

c. Motor Vehicles

The real owner of an automobile who has so acted as to clothe another with apparent ownership or authority to sell it, as in the case of a car left in a dealer's possession, is generally precluded from denying such ownership or authority as against one who has acquired the property in good faith for a consideration.

If the real owner of an automobile has so acted as to clothe another with apparent ownership or authority to sell it, he will be precluded from denying, as against those who act in good faith on that apparent authority and acquire the property for a consideration, that he had given such authority.[54]

strument.—Noland v. Law, 170 S.E 439, 170 S.C. 345.

Bonds

The doctrine of acquiring title by estoppel should be applied to registered bonds with much more caution than with respect to stock certificates, and a mere assignment in blank of instrument transferable only on books of issuing corporation is insufficient indicia of ownership to carry good title to transferee.—First Nat. Bank v. Mayor and City Council of Baltimore, D.C.Md., 27 F.Supp. 444, affirmed, C.C.A., 108 F.2d 600.

Mo.—Hannibal Inv. Co. v. Schmidt, App., 113 S.W.2d 1048.

Thus, where the owner, or one who has advanced the money to pay for the car, permits it to be kept in the salesroom of a dealer, who holds himself out to the world as owner thereof, and exhibits it for sale, he thereby clothes the dealer with such apparent ownership and authority to sell that he is estopped to assert his own superior title, as against a purchaser from the dealer in good faith and for full value in the regular course of business,[55] or as against one to whom the dealer assigns a mortgage or contract of conditional sale of the car to an innocent purchaser,[56] and this rule prevails notwithstanding an agreement by the dealer to deliver the car to no one except the owner or his order.[57] Similarly, the assignee of a contract of conditional sale of a car, made by a dealer, must see that the car after its recapture is not left under the control of the dealer, to be offered to the public, and where the car remains in the dealer's possession, the assignee is estopped to claim title as

(1) That the owner of a car exhibited it as the one to be given the winner of a newspaper subscription contest is sufficient to estop him from claiming title thereto on the ground that it had not been sold to the newspaper, as against the winner of the contest.—Jones v. Burks, 161 S.W. 177, 110 Ark. 108.

(2) One furnishing the money for the purchase of a car, who permits title to be taken in the name of another and possession to be retained by him, is estopped from denying such other's authority to mortgage the automobile to a third person.

Used car dealer

Owner who leaves his car with a used car dealer for the purpose of finding a purchaser clothes him with the indicia of authority to sell the car, according to the custom of trade, so that good title passes to an innocent buyer.—Rapp v. Fred W Hauger Motors Co., 246 P. 1067, 77 Cal.App. 417—Carter v. Rowley, 211 P. 267, 59 Cal App. 486—42 C.J. p 752 notes 61, 62.

Regular course of business

(1) A bill of sale executed by the dealer to the buyer is admissible as tending to show that the car was purchased in the ordinary course of business.—Finance Corp. v. Jones, 116 A. 277, 97 N.J.Law 106.

(2) Where the owner and the dealer had transactions extending over a considerable period, the purchaser is entitled to show their usual course of dealing both before and after the delivery to the dealer of the car in question, in order to show the dealer's authority to sell in the course of business.—Guaranty Security Corp. v. Eastern SS. Co., 134 N.E. 364, 241 Mass. 120.

against an innocent purchaser without actual notice of the prior sale, even though the contract was properly recorded.[58]

On the other hand, it has been broadly held that merely allowing another to have possession of an automobile is not enough to estop the owner from recovering his property from a third person who has purchased it in good faith from the possessor.[59] An estoppel may not be urged by one who has actual or constructive knowledge of the true ownership,[60] as in the case of a buyer who has not exercised ordinary caution and prudence;[61] nor can an estoppel be raised by one who has not relied and acted on the appearance of ownership.[62] The fact that the real owner permits another to take and hold title and exercise apparent ownership does not estop him to claim title as between himself and the nominal owner,[63] nor as against judgment creditors of the latter,[64] although there is authority to the contrary as to the rights of judgment creditors.[65] It has been held that a dealer's apparent authority to sell a car in his possession, estopping the real owner from denying such authority, does not extend to a pledge or mortgage of the car,[66] at least where the real owner did nothing to mislead the pledgee or mortgagee as to the conditions under which the dealer held possession,[67] but there

Estoppel held not created

(1) The delivery of an automobile to one to be repaired does not thereby clothe the bailee with the indicia of ownership so as to estop bailor as against buyer or mortgagee from bailee.

Ohio.—Schafstall v. Eastbour Garage, 30 N.E.2d 571, 65 Ohio App. 481.

(2) The fact that a dealer having possession of a truck under a bailment lease put it on exhibition in a salesroom, where he was engaged in buying and selling such vehicles, would not operate to convert the bailment into a conditional sale, or estop the owner from asserting his title.—Leitch v. Sanford Motor Truck Co., 123 A. 658, 279 Pa. 160.

(3) A chattel mortgagee who had no knowledge that automobile was to be resold in the usual retail way by a retail dealer who represented that the automobile was to be for dealer's own personal use, is not estopped as against a mortgagee of a purchaser from such dealer.—Springfield Loan Co. v. National Guarantee & Finance Co., 27 N.E.2d 257, 63 Ohio App. 508.

(4) Owner who intrusted automobile and blank certificate to third person was held not estopped to assert recovery against one purchasing from third person on forged certificate.—Mitchell v. Porter, 11 P.2d 58, 123 Cal.App. 329.

Exhibition to obtain offers

It has been held that giving possession of automobile to dealer, to exhibit for purpose of obtaining offers of purchase, does not of itself constitute estoppel to claim title.—Utica Trust & Deposit Co. v. Decker, 155 N.E. 665, 244 N.Y. 340, reversing 215 N.Y.S. 669, 217 App. Div. 137.
